At ten o'clock on that day was accomplished the voyage of a boat, laden with coal, from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea. At Ismaili, the termination point, a large body of the employés of M. de Lesseps, the director of the work, together with some hundreds of Arab sheiks, with all their attendants, gaily decked horses and dromedaries, were present to welcome the boat. M. de Lesseps, amid great sensation, addressed them in a speech of congratulation; and then, amid the firing of guns and the shouts of the tawny chiefs and their adherents, a dispatch was sent to the Emperor, announcing the fact, and within a few hours, in the midst of the festivities, a congratulatory message was received from Napoleon, which sent the enthusiasm up to boiling heat.

The English papers declare that the passage of this boat is a gross fraud on the world, and that the canal will really not be finished yet for three or four years. Doctors disagree.

A GOOSE has many quills, but an author can make a recee of himself with only one quill.

tresses fresh from an English convent. Vanity of vanities—its next appearance in all probability will be on the head of some maiden of Belgravia."

Hair merchants, by long experience, have acquired great proficiency in judging of the nationality of this article. One of the largest dealers in the trade in England declares that he could tell in the dark the nationality of any piece of hair. This is done either by the sense of touch or smell. Some nations have much coarser hair than others; indeed, there is a constant difference both with respect to length and weight. The average weight of a French head of hair (by which is meant the piece of long hair which forms the knot at the back of the head) is five ounces; of Italian, six ounces; of German, ten. This difference has much to do with its color. The chiffonniers who go about in Paris, morning and evening, picking out prizes from the gutter, have not overlooked human hair. By their agency the combings of the fair Parisienne are returned once more to the human head: no doubt there is a dust-heap odor the hair merchant knows well. But there is still another kind of hair about which there is a deep mystery. A grim smile passes over the features of the hair merchant as he tells you that the long "leech" of hair (for that is the trade name for the small parcels in which they are done up for sale, after being prepared and cleansed) is known as churchyard hair! As he draws attention with a certain subdued manner, to the squared end of the "leech," you perceive that they have not been cut, but pulled out of the head with the bulb adherent; sometimes this class of hair comes to market with pieces of the scalp-skin at the end. How this hair is obtained is a mystery which the trade does not care to fathom. When we so often hear of the desecration of churchyards, and the shoveling away of the old bones and decayed coffins, we may, perhaps, make a shrewd guess at the source from which this hair comes. It must be remembered that hair is almost indestructible. The beautiful wig of auburn hair now in the British Museum had lain in the tomb of a Theban mummy for upwards of two thousand years before it found its way to the national collection, yet that hair is as fresh as though it had just come from the hands of the hairdresser, and the curl is so strong in it that it cannot be taken out even by the application of heat. Churchyard hair is brought into the market by home as well as foreign collectors, and we cannot help suspecting that the gravedigger is no mean member of that craft.

ANGELINA;

OR,

THE LIFE OF A BEAUTY

By the author of "The Henpecked Husband," "Putting on Airs," &c., &c.,

The clever authoress of "Putting on Airs; or, a Warning to Wives," has been more than usually happy with her romantic combinations and sentimental DENOUEMENTS, in the "LIFE OF A BEAUTY." The narrative is developed with exceeding taste, and the work has the peculiar charm of combining two different romances, the first embracing the career of a spoiled mother, and the second that of a spoiled child. Angelina is a faithful type of the larvæ of fashionable life, and her mother an example of all the mischievous effects of a false system of education. The authoress of "A Warning to Wives" might well have named this work "A Lesson to Beauties."—Examiner.

ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE
For 1866.

It is with pleasure we are able to announce a much larger circulation for the "Home Magazine" during the year 1865 than it has ever before attained; and also a more heartily expressed approval, by subscribers and the press of its tone and character. During the next year we shall bring into its pages a still MORE VIGOROUS LITERARY LIFE—A HIGHER EXCELLENCE—A BROADER SPIRIT, and a more earnest advocacy of All Things Pure and Noble.

As heretofore, our aim will be to produce

not too didactic and heavy, but cheerful, animated, and social—a friend, dropping in upon quiet hours, with something always pleasant and profitable to say.

A new serial by MISS VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND will be commenced in the January number, entitled

"PETROLEUM."

The Home Magazine for 1866 will be enriched, not only with the best articles the editors can produce, but will number among its contributors many of The Leading Writers of the Country.

Our magazine is not simply a literary periodical. It takes higher ground, and seeks to make literature the handmaid of morality and religion, always teaching, whether by means of story, poem, or essay, that only by the "Golden Rule" can man live to any wise or good purpose. If you open your door to its visits, it will be

A True Friend in Your Household.

As heretofore, it will be embellished with STEEL ENGRAVINGS, FINE WOOD CUT ILLUSTRATIONS, MUSIC, PREVAILING STYLES OF DRESS, PATTERNS FOR GARMENTS AND EMBROIDERY, AND SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS FOR THE YOUNG PEOPLE, FOR MOTHERS, HEALTH, HOME CIRCLE, &c., &c.

Splendid Jewelry, Watches, Diamonds, &c.

The House of BOSANQUET, GIRAUD & Co., Paris, have the pleasure of announcing that they have opened an Agency in the City of New Xork, for the sale of their widely known Jewelry, Watches, &c., and for the purpose of making their goods as extensively known and appreciated in the United States as they now are, and have been for over 70 years in Europe, they have determined on a plan by which poor and rich alike may have the advantage of their splendid styles. As a preliminary, they would remerk that they manufacture and sell NO IMITATION JEWELRY or WATCHES, but

All are Warranted Gold of the Finest Workmanship.

Our customers will also have the great advantage of a constant succession of New and Recherche Styles and Patterns with which we shall keep our New York Agency supplied.

We have adopted the plan of sale now so popular, of charging a uniform price, and this price will invariably be $2 FOR EACH ARTICLE, no matter how costly it may be. The expenses of conducting our New York Agency are paid by the sale ot Certificates, or Coupons representing the various articles. These Certificates are sold at 50 cents each, or three for $1, and each Certificate will show the holder the particular article he or she is entitled to, on payment of an additional $2. If the article named on the Certificate is not desired, the holder will oblige us, when he returns the Certificate, by stating what other article of the same value, he or she may prefer, and it will be sent with pleasure.

OUR AIM IS TO PLEASE, and every means to that end will be exerted. We solicit a trial from every one who reads this notice, as we are confident of giving the utmost satisfaction.

THE STOCK COMPRISES

Among other articles Splendid Clocks, Gold and Silver Watches, Rings set with Diamonds, Rubies, Pearls, Garnet and other Stones (solitaire and in clusters), Ladies' Sets of Jewelry, comprising Pins and Ear-rings of the most fashionable styles, set in Precious Stones of every variety, together with a large assortment of Gold, Enameled and Pearl Sets, Gold Studs and Sleeve Buttons of the most beautiful patterns, Gent's Bosom and Scarf Pins, and an endless variety of Bracelets, Chains, Musical-boxes, Head-dresses, Combs, Charms, &c. In case any of our patrons are not in want of articles of Jewelry, and would prefer Silverware, we will send, for any Certificate returned to us, a richly engraved SET OF CASTORS, or BUTTER DISH, beautifully chased and plated.

AGENTS ARE WANTED in every part of the United States and Provinces, and to all such very liberal inducements will be offered, and, on application, a circular of terms will be forwarded. We prefer money sent in Post Office Orders where they can be obtained, or by Bank Draft to our order. Address all orders to our agency, which will be conducted by

The New York Weekly

THE GREATEST STORY AND SKETCH PAPER PUBLISHED,

IS NOW READY,

And contains the First Chapter of a New and Beautiful Story, from the pen of our popular contributor,

LOUIS LEON.

IT IS ENTITLED THE

HUNTED PIONEERS;

OR,

Strong Abe's Adventures

AMONG THE INDIANS.

A Tale of Frontier Life.

STRONG ABE, whose adventures among the Indians form the basis of these pages, belonged to a branch of the family of the late lamented

President of the United States.

He went to the wildernesses of Kentucky, where he became famous as a SCOUT, and was finally killed by the Indians; but the particulars of his removal to the

of the settlement he founded—of the daring deeds which won for him the soubriquet of

"STRONG ABE,"

of his battles with

of his noble and unselfish conduct during years of constant trials and danger, as the leader of the pioneers—all these fascinating and thrilling subjects are, for the first time, fully represented and displayed in this narration. We confidently anticipate, therefore, that the publication of will prove the greatest literary event of the day, attracting intense interest from one end of our country to the other, for not only are the persons and events figuring in the tale of a nature to fix general attention, but they also throw a most interesting light upon the sterling manhood of the ancestors of our glorious, deceased President, showing where he inherited his high qualities, and how worthy was the ancestor of his distinguished descendant.

In brief, this thrilling record of the affections, friendships, dangers, unselfish devotions, etc., etc., of this great pioneer, the heroic scout, cannot fail to charm the entire population of America. Let our readers all be on the lookout for it.

ALSO JUST COMMENCED, THE

DIARY OF A VILLAGE GOSSIP,

FROM THE PEN OF THE GIFTED

ALMEDIA M. BROWN, whose "DIARY OF A MINISTER'S WIFE" so deeply interested our readers.

THE EMBODIMENT OF PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented Nov. 15, 1864. The only Machine that LOCK STITCHES, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; its mechanism is perfect, it runs the lightest SEWING, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each revolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Skirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Change of Stitch—not even a LEAF, to GATHER or SEW, and will last a LIFETIME; being original it is by far the most useful and popular Machine. This is NOT a small Pocket Machine pushed by hand over the work like others advertised, but WORKS on a Table, and the work must pass through it like all Regular Machines.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of our Machine, will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicines. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. COMPLETE IN ONE VERY LARGE VOLUME

OF OVER 1,000 PAGES.

This work has no rival as a candid, lucid, complete, authentic and reliable history of the great conflict." It contains reading matter equal to three large royal octavo volumes, and is offered at a price to every one fine portrait of Generals, battle scenes, maps and diagrams.

In the selection of matter for this great work, the author has confined himself entirely to official data, derived from the reports of Northern and Southern Generals, the report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, Rebel and Union Archives, &c.

He has carefully avoided the introduction of any matter not strictly reliable and official, and has succeeded in producing what is universally demanded, a fair and impartial History of the War.

Returned and disabled officers and soldiers, and energetic young men in want of profitable employment, will find this a rare chance to make money. We have Agents clearing $300 per month. We will prove to any doubting applicant; for proof of the above send for circulars and new terms. ZIEBER, EBERLY, BROS. & CO., Philadelphia, Pa.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Boston, Mass.

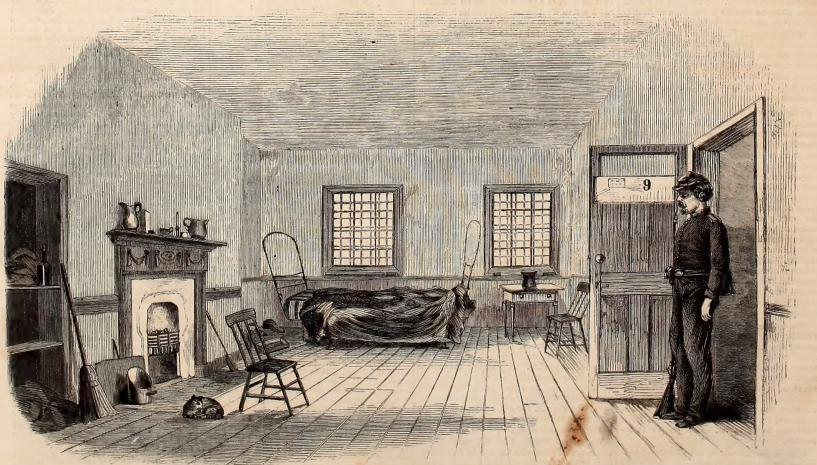
Spain Marauding.

Take her all in all, Spain is, probably, the most despicable power on the face of the earth. Bankrupt and discredited, she has, nevertheless, been able, through the mistaken forbearance of the United States, to prolong an existence neither useful to herself or creditable to the world. Too feeble for good, even had she the intent to do good, with a sovereign as notorious for her immorality as Catherine of Russia, or the veriest bawd in the House of Correction, deriving her principal revenues from the continuance of a traffic in slaves, which she is bound by treaty to suppress; as facile to break an oath, as ready to repudiate an obligation—this wrinkled, toothless, effete, and debauched power has, nevertheless, the impudence to prate of her honor, and to parade a number of war ships, for which she has not paid, in Pacific waters, in vindication of her pretended dignity! Her career of insulting arrogance and mercenary ambition in that quarter has, however, received a rather sudden check. She has embroiled herself in a war with Chili, the result of which is foreshadowed by that of her attempt on the independence of Santo Domingo—an attempt which was not merely a failure, but a deep humiliation and black disgrace.

We say that she has embroiled herself in a war with Chili, the most advanced, industrious, enterprising, orderly, and reliable of the Spanish-American States; one, also, which is specially attached to our country, and which has singular claims on our regard and sympathy. As the events of our great war overshadowed all others occurring in other parts of the world during its continuance, it cannot be expected that our people should remember those that have taken place in the Pacific, and led to this rupture between Spain and Chili. We will make a rapid recurrence to them.

At the height of the insurrection, when all Europe, and especially its monarchs, thought the disruption of the Union inevitable, was formed an unholy alliance, under the auspices of the French Emperor, directed against the Republican principles and free institutions in America. England undertook the part, far less easy than she imagined, of securing the division and consequent paralyzation of the power of the United States. How faithfully she worked in her allotted part, we all know but too well. France undertook to suffocate Republicanism in Mexico and Central America, and Spain, with the aid of renegades, the re-establishment of her dominion over the States once her colonies. In pursuance of her rôle she attempted the occupation of the little republic of Santo Domingo, and, with the aid of France, sent out a fleet to pick a quarrel with Peru, the richest, probably, but most vulnerable of the South-American republics. Here, on pretexts only to be paralleled, for shallowness and impudence, by those of the wolf versus the lamb in the fable, this fleet seized on the great guano islands, valued at a thousand millions of dollars for their deposits, and endeavored to appropriate them for the replenishing of the empty and dusty exchequer of Spain.



PREPARING THE PRISONER FOR EXECUTION—PUTTING ON THE BLACK ROBE.

A seizure so wanton and unjustifiable, naturally roused great excitement among the neighbors of Peru, and Chili, sympathizing with her, accepted the act of war as sufficient evidence of belligerency, and refused the sale of coal to the Spanish fleet from the government mines. There were also many popular demonstrations of sympathy with Peru among the people of Chili, but only such as it was the right of a free people to make. The representatives of an offensive nation must expect groans instead of cheers from the populace, and criticisms instead of plaudits from a free press.

The question between Spain and Peru, after remaining an open one for a year, was finally settled by an agreement on the part of the President of the latter country, supposed to have been, from the start, in complicity with Spain, to pay $4,000,000 to defray the cost of the Spanish aggression, and leaving all other questions in abeyance. This surrender of the rights and honor of Peru led to a revolution in the country, now nearly successful.

Spain having succeeded so easily in bullying Peru out of a round sum, sufficient to keep up her faded grandeur for some months longer, next turned her attention to Chili, taking, as a pretext for offence, the action of the latter during the Peruvian imbroglio. The matter, however, was easily adjusted, and in a manner compromising the dignity of neither party. through the Spanish Chargé d'Affairs, Señor Tavera. Everybody supposed the whole difficulty, in its real, as well as pretended features, was finally disposed of.

But the Spanish Government, flushed, perhaps, with its easy success in Peru, and eager for more plunder, refused to sanction the adjustment made by its own agent, and sent out instructions to its admiral (Pareja), to re-open the whole affair, which he did on the 17th of September, in an insulting and peremptory note, ending with a threat, that unless his ultimatum, fixed with ever-varying conditions or consultation, was unconditionally accepted, he should resort to forcible measures.

The Government of Chili, consulting its own dignity and honor, refused to act in any way under an uplifted hand, and insisted that the causes of grievance, if any, should be at first stated, and redress asked for, in the manner prescribed among civilized nations. No greater insult is possible than that of making a reclamation, coupled with a threat. To this proper conduct of Chili, the bombastic admiral responded by declaring a blockade of the ports of Chili, giving to the neutral vessels to get away. If he supposed that thereby he would frighten the Chilenos, he was mistaken, for they responded to his proclamation by a declaration of war.

As Pareja has only seven lumbering vessels of war, his declaration of the blockade of 2,000 miles of coast, and some twenty odd ports, comes under the denomination of "paper blockade," which no one is bound to respect. Chili has retaliated by opening all her ports, and declaring them free, so that foreign vessels may enter, and enter their cargoes without payment of any custom dues. She has, or speedily will issue letters of marque and reprisal, and Spain may expect soon to witness the sea-hawks hovering in front of her peninsular ports. Chili has also authorized a loan of twenty millions, which, as her solvency is undoubted, can readily be raised. Her people are contributing their means with alacrity; the authorities are suspected all Spanish priests; parties are forgotten, and an enthusiasm and unity prevails among the people, only equaled by that which pervaded the North on the call for the men to the defence ment of Fort Sumter. The diplomatic corps, under the lead of our minister, Mr. Nelson, whom our Government is under every obligation to sustain, has taken high and strong ground against the unprecedented and unwarranted action of the Spaniards. The foreign residents in the country seem equally unanimous.

It is presumable that the issue between Spain and Chili will take wider dimensions. The revolutionary party in Peru, which owes its very existence to the fact that the Government of Spain did not do precisely what that of Chili has now done, is bound to support the Chilian cause. In fact this new issue seems likely to lead to a cessation of hostilities in Peru, and a consolidation of all parties for the assistance of Chili. Spain has presumed too much, and involved herself in a struggle which will not terminate until she is stripped of the last vestige of her power on this continent, and in its adjacent waters. Now is the time for Cuba to act. The day of her independence dawns.

As for our own conduct? When the representatives of the people of the United States assemble in Washington next month, we shall, probably, learn whether the principle of all others most cherished in the American heart shall be sacrificed to the views which dodge lakes of the seeds of a diplomatic system, itself only a relic of the middle ages, and beneath the contempt of the practical sense and clear intelligence of the day. The Peruvian affair is a man of the people, whose heart beats responsive to theirs, and we look to him and to Congress for such an assertion of the doctrine that bears the venerated name of Monroe, as shall send back Bip Van Winkles of politics, and the blear-eyed followers of antiquated systems of policy to the congenial and cob-webbed retreats where they should long ago have found refuge for their infirmities, and immunity from 19th century criticism.

The duty of the United States as regards Chili is plain. We cannot, in the first place, permit the establishment of "paper blockades," or the sacrifice of our commercial interests to enable Spain to extort a few paltry millions for its depleted treasury. On higher grounds, we ought not to permit a sister republic, and one above all others most deserving our consideration and support, to be annoyed or oppressed by a nation not only foreign, but a bankrupt in character, and a pauper in resources.

Spanish commerce does not offer the richest prizes for privateering enterprise. But it will do, pending the opportunity for something better!

The Leading Traitor.

Now that the majesty of the law has been vindicated in the execution of Henri Wirz, and sensation-mongers are shown that all their false promises and theories have no effect on the head of the nation, it is time to turn from the dead to the living—from Wirz to his aiders and abettors.

There has, of late, through all the States just emerging from rebellion, been a movement to influence President Johnson in favor of the prime mover of all our troubles, and to bring about a pardon without trial. The consummation of such an idea is simply absurd, and the means used to facilitate it worthy of the source whence they originated. The principal of these means is the petition, a petition signed by thousands of the fair and delicate fingers of Southern ladies, perhaps many of them still enclasped with the gay trinkets sent home by adoring lovers and husbands, from the prison dens of Andersonville and Salisbury, as tokens of appreciation of the physical structure of what they elegantly termed "hated Yankees."

In entering any protest against these petitions, we do not for one instant suppose that they will have any effect on President Johnson. He knows exactly the value of such scrip, and exactly the source from whence it emanates. Andrew Johnson has taken no pains to conceal the embryo nature of the treason, or the punishment due it. The man who could speak these words:

"I am in favor of leniency; but, in my opinion, evil doers should be punished. Treason is the highest crime known in the catalogue of crimes, and for him that is guilty of it—for him who is willing to lift his sacrilegious hand against the authority of the nation—I would say that death is too easy a punishment. My notion is, that treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their property must be taken, and they made to feel the penalty of their crime. Hence, I say this, 'The halter to intelligent, influential traitors!'"

This he said, at a public meeting on the 3d of last April, in Washington city, and he is not the man to give way to sentimentality when a question of national pride and honor comes before him. We need not judge him alone by this asseveration. If we go over his speeches and acts, we will find them breathing the same sentiment throughout. At one time he says:

"At the beginning of this great struggle, I entertained the same opinion of it that I do now, and in my place in the Senate I denounced it as treason, worthy the punishment of death."

And again, in the same forcible and positive language:

"If we would save the Government we must bring traitors to the punishment due their crime."

These were speeches made before his elevation to his present high office, but they only breathe his unaltered sentiment of the present hour. Since that elevation he has spoken these words:

"The only assurance I can now give of the future is by reference to the past. The course which I have taken in the past, in connection with this rebellion, must be regarded as a guarantee of the future."

And with these words unretracted, it seems strange if we cannot trust Andrew Johnson to perform the work he has set out to perform, and not to let the suspicion upon him that he believes his Government is not strong enough to punish a traitor, but must pardon Davis, because a few whining editors on both sides of the Atlantic cry out in alarm, or because a few women who have pas sively tender consciences as to their own agency in his unhappy position, send petitions for his pardon. If petitions are wanted to influence the matter, ten signatures to one can be produced from the women of the North, who have lost brothers, husbands and fathers in this fearful war, for the punishment of the man who has been first and foremost in the bloody work that consigned them to death.

We do not cry aloud for this man's blood, we are not of those who say let him be hanged, trial or no trial, but we hold that we should be disgraced as a people, for ever, should the executive yield to the pressure that is now being brought to bear upon him, and enlarge this leading traitor on parole or without trial.

There is a new book, by Mr. Raymond, of the Times, entitled "History of the Administration of President Lincoln, etc.," in which are related some new anecdotes of our late President. Among them the following:

"About a week after the Chicago Convention, a gentleman from New York called on the President, in company with the Austrian Secretary-of-War, Dana. In the course of conversation, the gentleman said: 'What do you think, Mr. President, in the recent Gen. McClellan does not reply to the letter from the Chicago Convention?' 'Oh,' replied Mr. Lincoln, with a characteristic twinkle of the eye, 'he is intrenching!'"

Another:

"A deputation from the temperance bodies in the New England States waited upon him at the White House, and urged him to issue an order to send temperance lecturers into the camps, with the same rights and powers as the chaplains had claimed. As an undertaker, and professedly in favor of the Maine Liquor Law, his friends were chiefly of that way of thinking, and the deputation supposed they would have an easy task of it, although they knew that the President, the Commander-in-Chief, was hostile to their plans. He set out their facts in a strong colors, as the manner is with all sectarists, declaring that the armies were demoralized with drink, and that most of the officers were drunkards. Among other and last things he said to the President, that if the army was, that Gen. Grant was fond of whisky, and that he had been seen many times in a state very much disinclined to headquarters. When they had finished their tale, the President, looking up, quietly asked the question, 'Well, gentlemen, and did you ascertain where Gen. Grant got his whisky?' 'Oh, yes,' replied the orator, 'we did not try to learn.' 'Ah!' said the President-at, 'that is a pity. If you could only ascertain that, I should like to find out me, so I should like to have sent some of the same whisky to every General in the service.'"

Once more:

"Judge Baldwin, of California, being in Washington, called one day on Mr. Lincoln, and, presuming upon a familiar acquaintance in California a few years since, solicited a pass outside the lines to visit a brother in Virginia, not thinking that he would meet with a refusal. Mr. Lincoln replied, 'I myself never good Union men. 'We have been deceived too often,' said Gen. Baldwin. 'Why, Baldwin,' said Mr. Lincoln, 'I know you went to Stanton, and was very briefly disposed of, with the statement that I (Mr. Lincoln) am inferior with Mr. Lincoln, and stated his case. 'Have you applied to Mr. Lincoln?' said Stanton. 'No, sir.' 'Then you will go with a flat refusal,' said Judge B. 'Then you must see Mr. Lincoln,' said Stanton. 'I have, and with the same result,' was the reply. 'Well, then,' said Mr. Lincoln, with a smile, 'I can do nothing; for you must know that I have very little influence with the Secession traitors.'"

The great cemetery at Andersonville, wherein He buried the Union soldiers, the victims of Winder, Wirz, and Company, has been embowed, laid out and planted at the expense of the nation. A correspondent of the Times describes the cemetery:

"It is a square, containing 47 acres. Entering the south gate, next the stockade, a broad carriage-way leads directly through the centre of the grounds, on either side of which are very many long lines of graves, extending to the trenches where our dead are buried. A neatly graded pathway, at the foot of the carriage-road, leads to the south (nearly one hundred feet) each of these trenches, where the name, regiment and company of the soldier is neatly cut by the passing visitor. These two solid, close-columned divisions of the soldiers' graves are separated by a broad walk in the centre of the grounds. A little to the right, are buried the murderers, executed from soldiers—who were hung by our soldier-prisoners for murdering and robbing their fellows. On the largest branch thereof, the graves is located in the northeast corner, occupying about one acre. The number of graves is thirteen hundred and 12,888. Add to the 61 prisoners who died of small-pox, and were buried outside the stockade, the 13 who were hung, and one negro soldier, and the total mortality of Rebel Wirz's army prisoners among the soldiers of the Union is 12,963, including 12 rebels executed here, the grand total is 13,555. On a little white-painted board at the left of the entrance, I read the following record following inscription:

"'On God's eternal camping ground,
Their silent tents are spread;
And glory guards, with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.'

"Further along the wide carriage-way, towards the centre, on the right, we read:

"'Whether in the prison drear,
Or in the battle's van,
The fittest place for man to die,
Is where he dies for man.'

"'The hopes, the fears, the blood, the tears,
That nurture the battle's wrath,
Are now all crowned by victory,
And blossom in after path.'

"Close to the flagstaff, from which floats the starry banner, is the central terminus of this broad carriage-way, in another inscription, running thus:

"'A thousand battle-fields have drank
The blood our heroes bave,
And countless homes are dark and drear
Thro' the hand they died to save.'"

When Lord Alvanley fought a duel with Morgan O'Connell, several shots were exchanged, after which the seconds interfered, and stopped the proceedings. "O'Connell must be a very clumsy fellow," said Alvanley, on his way home, "or he never would have missed such a fat fellow as I am. He ought to practice at a haystack to get his hand in." He gave the hackney coachman a sovereign. "It's a great deal for only having taken your lordship to Wimbledon," said the coachman. "My good man," said Alvanley, "I gave it to you not for taking me, but for bringing me back."

On the matter of ventilation, Dr. Angus Smith, in a communication to the recent Social Science Congress, in England, presented a series of interesting facts, relative to the evil results in ventilated and unventilated places. Observations have shown that the carbonic acid of pure places is from 300 to 340 in a million; in towns which seem very much polluted by smoke it rises only to 403 as an average in the best streets, although in places manifestly impure, the average obtained is 774. In workshops it rises to 3,000 or more, and in mines sometimes to 20,000, or even more, in a million. Dr. Smith believed that we can bear in cold weather an inferior ventilation. Many who insisted on pure air forgot this, although instinctively they act on it when not misled.

Chambers of Commerce are not usually paragons of wisdom, but they are not necessarily "muffs" beyond redemption. They have often a notion, probably erroneous, that they lubricate the wheels of creation, and, in some instances, they have been known to talk common sense during what the doctors might call "lucid intervals." The Chamber of Commerce of New York has lately had what the lamented sage of Brooklyn Heights would have called a "rational term," and adopted resolutions applauding the speech of the Secretary of the Treasury at Fort Wayne, as well as approving of his recent action in funding $50,000,000 of legal tender notes, thus giving the assurance of his determination to exert his influence and authority in favor of an early return to specie payments. The Chamber also extends its protest against every appeal that may be made to Congress, at the approaching session, to increase the issue of the National Bank currency beyond the $300,000,000 authorized, or the issue of a single dollar more of paper money in any form.

The design for the proposed monument to Shakespeare in Stratford-on-Avon is illustrated in a London journal. It is a very fine conception, and is splendid proportion and finish. The column will be one hundred feet in height, and thirty-six feet broad at the bottom of the steps. It will be ornamented through all its stages with Shakespearian figures. The upper tier of statues is shown upon the third stage, which, with those below and the supporting groups, at the top, St. George of England slaying the dragon, number between thirty and forty.

It has been ascertained that during the entire war the navy has lost only fourteen hundred and six men in killed, and sixteen hundred and thirty-eight in wounded. Most of the severely wounded sailors and marines who have been on the rolls. This is inclusive of all losses in the grand battles of the monitors before Charleston, Mobile and Fort Fisher, and elsewhere. The whole expense of the navy since the beginning of the war, including the construction of gunboats, and all its vessels and their maintainance, has been less than $230,000,000, or only about seven and a half per cent. of the cost of the army. We have commanded since 1861 two hundred and ten vessels of war, all of which are of the most improved models, and contain all the appliances of modern offensive and defensive warfare.

Every day gives confirmation of the purpose of the President to insist on the constitutional method by us last week, as precedent and essential to the restoration of the late rebellious States. He was besieged, a few days ago, by a delegation from the North Carolina State Convention, who told before him a copy of the new Constitution of that State, and expressed a hope that Congress would not insist on the representatives elect for North Carolina taking the "test oath." The President responded briefly, telling the delegates that the constitution presented to him to enable the State to resume her relations with the Union, and added that the adoption of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the United States, was "practically important" to that end. He further told them that his action as regards the latter point must "depend on events," and that he had determined to continue Mr. Holden as Provisional Governor, pending the development of those events. In addition to this, notwithstanding North Carolina has elected a Legislature and Governor, she will be kept under the military authority until she has quieted herself by a complete acceptance of the results of the war, for resuming her old associations. As regards South Carolina, the President has directed Provisional Governor Perry to continue the discharge of his functions, and has advised him that he has "observed with regret that some of the convention nor the Legislature" have repudiated the rebel debts, and that the constitutional amendment has not been adopted. He tells the governor that the adoption of the latter measure is "peculiarly important, and especially desirable." The inference is, therefore, strong, that all the Confederate States will be kept fully the status of the war. The prospects of their rehabilitation are by no means as rosesate as they were in August.

A chess problem published by the Philadelphia Fair paper is the most complicated in the records of the game. The proposition is, "White to move, and compel Black to mate in eighteen moves." But it is not so difficult as the problem that certain parties are trying to solve down South—White to move, and prevent Black's moving at all!

It is a pity that the secretary who writes Queen Victoria's messages could do as much credit to his royal mistress. Nothing could be clumsier than the Queen's assurance to Lady Palmerston "of her heart-felt and deep sympathy with her under this deep trial."

A GLEAM of truth occasionally breaks past the dense, characteristic body of the enemy of the Parisian press. "The harp of a thousand strings," on which Napoleon plays with so much effect, occasionally rings a discordant note, or two, spontaneously. Thus the Paris Presse, of October 15th indulges in something like rational and independent comment, as follows. We are not yet informed if it has received "a warning."

"It must be acknowledged that the two great powers of Europe, France and England, desire the success of secession. France morally, and England materially, have made considerable efforts to help the latters independence. The Monitour, and all the journals devoted to the policy of the French government, dissembled neither their sympathy nor their enthusiasm for the confederates. England went further, since she allowed vessels of war—whose destination was no secret —to be constructed in her own yards; she allowed, in the most open manner, a loan of a hundred millions of francs to be raised, and officially quoted as the cotton loan on the stock exchanges of London and Liverpool. She furnished to an enormous amount arms, ammunition, and other articles contraband of war, by means of blockade runners, which were built at Birkenhead

Glasgow, and Greenock, and which were sure to enter the confederate ports, in spite of the American cruisers, which had to watch some four thousand miles of coast. "This is a singular kind of neutrality, and resembles very much those hard-working fellows who carry on business with the penal code in their hands, following the law as closely as possible without infringing it."

THE Turkish finances are in such a despairing condition, that the Government has mooted the project of appropriating the extensive property of the mosques—a proceeding which would create much excitement among the fanatical Turks, whose name is legion. The "sick man" grows sicker and sicker.

A MOST cruel law has just been published in the so-called "Empire of Mexico," making it death to have any connection or communication with the Liberals, and obliging all to give information against them.

A PETITION is in circulation in Boston, urging Mr. Seward not to press our claims on Great Britain for compensation for damages inflicted on our commerce by the Anglo-rebel Alabamas, Shenandoahs, etc., on the ground that while the admission of the principle we contend for would only give us a few hundred millions, the acceptance of the British view would enable us to reimburse ourselves two or three times over, whenever England should become involved in war. The petition does not run on the ground of morality but of interest, and in this sense is all right.

TOWN GOSSIP.

LAST week we talked about cholera, and though that is still the all-absorbing topic, we will endeavor to speak of something a little pleasanter.

The only question is, what shall that pleasanter be? for it is a most melancholy fact that "there's nothing stirring but stagnation" just now. There is absolutely nothing of real sensational import in New York. The musicians have come down or been put down, the Fenians are quiet, the Mexican loan is being negotiated, and all is going smooth and easy.

We do not know but the highest local sensation just now, is Monsieur Blot's Cooking School at 846 Broadway. There the professor is endeavoring to teach the young idea, not to shoot, but to cook. The school is actually open, and numbers several hundreds in its class. These the professor gathers to an intellectual and epicurean feast, not only teaching them in the blandest and most practical way how to do it, but when they have done it, allowing them to eat it up.

In his fifth lecture to his advanced class, the bill of fare laid down was as follows:

Potage jardiniere.
Striped bass à la Colbert.
Beef (boiled) Hollandaise.
Pigeons in compote.
Cauliflowers fried.
Celery stewed.
Petites bouches à la crême.

A dinner for a lord, provided he is a hungry one.

The professor, with the aid of certain of his scholars, now goes to work, and before his class, takes the raw material and from it prepares each dish and cooks it, discoursing sweet culinary music all the time. The dinner is laid out for a certain hour, three o'clock. The lecture begins at one precisely, and the preparation of the first dish with the lecture, which is the potage jardiniere. The lecture finishes at three minutes before three, and the dinner is on the table at three o'clock.

There is a great deal of good to grow out of this school, if it is properly conducted. No one will deny that it is wanted, and the want is freely acknowledged by the ladies of New York, who not only attend in such numbers themselves, but send their servants that they may profit by M. Blot's instruction.

Last week we had something to say about the strike of musicians, this week there has been another theatrical strike—or something approaching it—among the ladies of the profession. The ballet girls have met in serious conclave, and concluded—and a wise conclusion it is—that they are under-paid, and must have more. They met in a hotel on the Bowery, the parlor of which was given up for their use by the kind-hearted proprietor. There were several speeches made, and the general statement was, that the girls of the Broadway theatres get $6, and those of the Bowery $5, out of which they have to find dresses, and that it is totally impossible for them to live on it.

One lady, in her address, said, "We are subject to the sneers and insults of every fop that comes to the theatre, and even in the streets, we are recognized and hooted after, under the name of 'supe!' It is true our business is humble, but still we are necessary to managers, and with the present high prices for board, and, in fact for everything, it is impossible to live on the low salary we get. But, thank God! ballet girls as we are, we can preserve our self-respect, and refuse to submit to such gross injustice any longer."

Another lady said that she was not at that moment dependent on her profession for a home, as she had an aged mother who gave her that, but her mother's income ceased with her life, and then what would she do when the $5 per week she now got, would do no more than keep her in dresses for the stage. She said:

"Sometimes I am compelled to get a new stage dress, and then, not only my own pittance goes, but I am compelled to get mother to assist. A few nights ago, I was cast in a small part, for one night only, and I was obliged to get a new dress which cost me $10."

A third young lady said: "I am an orphan, and am obliged to subsist myself and a little sister on my earnings. I sometimes add to my $5 per week, by a little needlework, but that I have to do most of on Sunday, for I am at rehearsal from 10 to 1 o'clock, every day."

This was the tenor of the speeches, after which, these resolutions were passed:

"Whereas—The members of every branch of industry, except ours, have demanded an increase of wages from their employers, and have received the same, and

"Whereas—The high prices of provisions render it impossible for a young girl to support herself, even with the most rigid economy, and

"Whereas—By the recent strike of the musicians, some of the managers have saved about one hundred dollars a week, be it therefore

"Resolved—That a petition be drawn up and signed by the president and secretary of this meeting, respectfully asking an increase of our salaries of at least 50 per cent, which will make Broadway prices $9, and Bowery $7 50 per week."

These resolutions having been adopted, the meeting was about to break up, when an invitation came from the generous proprietor of the hotel to supper, which was fully discussed, and a determination arrived at to hold another meeting when it was necessary.

Whether the managers have acceded to the very reasonable demand we have not heard, but hope they have.

One of the pleasant little episodes of the week has been an agitation in high life, in consequence of the unkenneling of a bogus count, and the handing of him over to the police.

He called himself Count Adolph Graf du Dohna Schlodeen, and represented himself a member of the illustrious Dohna family, of Prussia.

He has been living for the past several months at the Everett House, and going into tip top society, to which he represented himself as an exile from home on account of a family quarrel. He was always looking for remittances, and always on the borrow, by which he managed to keep up a style that was the envy of all the fast young men about town. His dinners and suppers were incomparable, and his successes with the fair sex the marvel of everybody. All was fish that came to his net, and when everything else failed, bounty-jumping came into play, and he replenished his pockets that way.

At last the time came when the count was fairly stumped, and he undertook to raise money by a new method, which was by threatening the fair ones who had corresponded with him, and whose loving epistles he held, that, unless they came down with a certain amount in greenbacks, he would expose their letters, and boast of improprieties. This killed him, for, though he succeeded in some cases, one at last set him at defiance, and told her husband, who set detectives on his track. Mr. Count was finally arrested, and the whole of his history came out, which was that his real name happened to be Francis Stabenow, that he had robbed the real Count Dahna in Prussia, and fled to this country about a year ago, and has ever since been living by swindling.

Since the arrest the fashionable world has been all of a twitter, and many a fair lady is wondering what disposition has been made of the 200 letters that were taken from the bogus count.

How strange is life!

There is nothing especially new at the theatres.

Brougham is having a most successful time at the Winter Garden, though he has been "Playing With Fire" all the time. At the end of this week he goes to Philadelphia, and other places, and we predict will be the theatrical sensation of the day.

Wallack has made a great success with the "Needful," having run it without interruption for a number of nights, and only withdrawn it to make off nights, so that city people may have a change.

We are very sorry to have to chronicle the death of Mr. John P. Cooke, so long and so well known as a leader of different orchestras, lately of the Broadway. Mr. Cooke was well known as a composer, having written the overture for "Sam," as now played at that house. Mr. Cooke was the arranger of Lover's song of "The Bould Soger Boy," Mr. Lover, though a composer, not being able to arrange his own songs.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Longfellow's house in Cambridge, once the headquarters of Washington, was built by a tory, and was confiscated by the Legislature.

—— A $2,000 horse ran against a tree at Nashville and dashed its expensive brains out.

—— They got into the way once of naming new blocks in Washington, Rows—as Minnesota Row, &c. They have started a new row there of late and call it Bureau.

—— A Georgia journal says that many of the leading Methodist clergymen of that State, in consequence of their hostility to their Northern brethren, have made overtures to the Episcopalians for a union with them.

—— The Dayton, Ohio, Northwest, says that a sweet potatoe was raised in that county upon which a family of 10 children subsisted for six weeks, and the peeling is now being used as a bed-quilt.

—— The Boston Transcript says that there are two children, aged respectively seven-and-a-half and nine years, in jail in that city, whose offence was stealing grapes, and they were imprisoned because they were unable to pay the fine and costs.

—— A young man in a Vermont village used fruit freely from a lady's garden all summer, against her wishes, and lately he received a large bill for it, which he paid, rather than figure in court.

—— A piece of flannel shirt was taken from the lungs of a man in Portland, Maine, a short time since, where it had been driven by a bullet at the second battle of Bull Run.

—— A New York correspondent of a Philadelphia paper says: "An 'Anti-Matrimonial Society' is about to be organized in this city by the gentlemen. Its object is to reduce the habits of extravagance now so prevalent among the ladies, and the members of the society pledge themselves not to marry until the ladies 'come down.'" —— A girl, 16 years of age, overcome with rage at being worsted in a wrangle with her sister, committed suicide in Lynchburg, Va., by swallowing opium.

—— A man named Jameson, in Cincinnati, wishing to curtail household expenses, adopted a novel mode to effect his object. He kissed the servant girl one morning, when he knew Mrs. J. would see him. Results, discharged servant girl, and $12 per month saved.

—— A Buffalo burglar after working diligently for several hours, a few nights since, to gain entrance to a safe, which he finally effected by means of gunpowder, was rewarded for his labor by the discovery of two dollars and eighty cents, that being the entire amount the safe contained.

—— A second sale of household furniture belonging to the late Mrs. Surratt, took place at the "Surrat House" in Washington, one day last week. A large number of persons improved the opportunity, thus offered, to visit the house rendered famous by its connection with the assassination of President Lincoln. Few actual purchasers, however, were present, and all the articles offered went at low rates.

—— There was a lively time in the town of Madison, Iowa, on election day. A man named William Blue was shot in the abdomen, Jack Blue received a shot in the spine, a man by the name of Hale was knocked down, another man by the same name received five knife wounds and a shot in the back of the neck, and a man named Robinson was cut with a knife in the back.

—— As much nitrate of soda as can be held between the thumb and finger, it is said, if thrown into a vase of water, will preserve flowers for the space of a fortnight. This may be an interesting fact for the ladies.

—— The San Francisco Courier asserts that the Shenandoah, having need of supplies, equipped one of its prizes, put on board a picked crew, and sent it into the port of San Francisco. Here the ship was loaded with provisions, and the various articles required by the Shenandoah, and, after obtaining a clearance for Victoria, sailed from San Francisco and safely rejoined her consort.

—— There is a question, says the Boston Transcript, whether or not the pirate captain of the Shenandoah is aware of the collapse of the rebellion. It seems to us that, at any rate, he can have no clear idea of the state of things in the southern section of the country. If he did, he would abandon his present business, return to the South, be elected Governor of a reconstructed State, or member of Congress from one of the new districts. In case it was his fortune to be chosen to Congress, he has Provisional Governor Perry's assurance that it will be all right.

—— The negroes in Richmond were much frightened by the recent eclipse of the sun. Some of them who had not been apprised of the performance, were seized with mortal terror when the orb of day grew dim, and flopped down on their knees and put up to heaven the sincerest prayers they have uttered since the evacuation. They believed the end of all things was at hand, and were listening for the "last trump."

—— A Buffalo paper says of the Siamese Twins that, "Eng's base of operations is on the right, while Chang's is on the left. Eng is slightly taller than Chang, though there is nothing in his conversation or demeanor from which it could be inferred that he feels above the brother to whom he is so firmly attached. Chang is fifty-four years old; we did not inquire the age of Eng."

—— An omnibus driver, accompanied by a nautical friend, the captain of a wood smack—started out on a spree, in Boston, on Monday night last, and becoming more or less "incoherent," insisted upon kissing all the pretty females they chanced to encounter. The affectionate couple were, however, arrested at the instigation of the indignant wife of a prominent merchant, and, when taken before a justice, exonerated themselves from the charge of misdemeanor on the ground that they had duly taken out licenses for "bussing" and "smacking," and consequently were unable to discover in what manner they had offended the law.

—— During the celebration of high mass at St. Peter's Church, in Philadelphia, on Sunday last, a violent panic was created by an individual who rushed violently into the church during service, screaming "fire! fire!" at the top of his voice, and throwing off his coat and hat, as if preparing to combat the flames. The congregation, as might be expected, rushed pell mell over the seats and through the doors, overturning the weak and young, several of whom were seriously injured. It was soon discovered that the alarm was false, and that the person who had thus unceremoniously invaded the sanctuary was crazy.

—— Albert Starkweather, the wretch who recently murdered his mother and sister near Hartford, and who is now awaiting trial in the jail of that city, attempted to effect his escape therefrom on Saturday night last. His plan, as revealed to a fellow convict, was to feign sickness, then to call in the jailer, whom he was to kill with a stick taken from the bedstead. Robbing the dead man of his keys, he would then, under cover of the night, easily make his escape from the jail. His confidant, however, informed the jailer of the intended assassination, and Starkweather was removed to more secure quarters. This desperate character, ever since his confinement, has been constantly planning an escape, and on one occasion offered the estate of his mother, valued at $12,000, to the jailer, if he would permit him to get out.

—— Considerable excitement exists in the town of Danvers, Mass., consequent upon the discovery in their coal bins by a number of families, of several torpedoes. A Mrs. Lord discovered the first one, by its explosion in her range, which burst with terrific force. On examining the coal bin, more of the infernal machines were found, and this fact being communicated to the firm who furnished the coal, an examination of their stock was made, which resulted in their finding some half dozen more of them. In size and construction these instruments are identical, consisting of a tin box, made to imitate a lump of coal, containing a quantity of the best quality of powder, and in which are three percussion caps, bound on by a strip of lead almost an inch in width, and fastened to the bottom of the box. How they got into the coal is a mystery.

—— Senator Howe, of Wisconsin, in a recent speech, affirmed that of the thirteen States made free by the war of the Revolution, Delaware and South Carolina alone excluded colored persons from the right of suffrage. Connecticut, he says, as late as 1818, gave suffrage to all who had been "admitted freedmen" up to that time. New Jersey gave it to "all inhabitants of the State of full age and worth fifty dollars." Virginia, in her famous Bill of Rights, adopted on the 12th of June, 1776—the day star of the great Declaration—affirmed "that all men, having sufficient evidence of paramount common interest with an attachment to the community, have the right of suffrage." North Carolina extended suffrage to "freemen" possessed of a certain freehold estate; and Georgia did the same, without reference to the distinction of color.

—— The death of the Hon. Jacob Collamer, United States Senator from Vermont, took place at his residence in Woodstock, November 8. Mr. Collamer was seventy-three years of age at the time of his death, having been born in Troy, N.Y., in 1792.

—— George Arnold, a young man of favorable literary reputation, and widely known in this city as a contributor to the current literature of the day, died Thursday, November 9th, after a short illness. Mr. Arnold was widely known as the writer of the amusing "McArone" papers, and by various contributions to Vanity Fair, the Leader, and other journals.

Foreign.—The Comte Cavour, a Turin journal, confidently announces that the problem of perpetual motion has been solved by M. Loucre Rizzo, a mechanic of Strasburg, who, the same journal asserts, has invented a machine which finds its motive force within itself without any external aid.

—— Turkey has been startled by the rumor of a great innovation perpetrated by the Sultan. It is said that he is having his portrait painted by a French artist, M. Guillemet. Hitherto all representations of the human form have been deemed profane by the true Mahometans.

—— In the year 1841, the quantity of tobacco consumed in Great Britain was such as to average 13¾ ounces per head of population. In the year 1851 it had risen to 1 pound ½ ounce per head; in the year 1861, to 1 pound 3½ ounces; in the year 1863, to 1 pound 4½ ounces.

—— A subscription has been set on foot for the erection of a memorial to Sir Joshua Reynolds in his native town of Plympton, Devon, England. The contemplated form of the memorial is a a stained-glass window in the church.

—— A codfish caught off Flamborough Head, England, in being opened was found to contain in its stomach, a pair of spectacles with brass frames.

—— A few days ago, a girl aged 14, residing at Deliverande, near Caen, was cutting a slice of bread for her father, holding the loaf pressed against her chest, when the knife slipped through it, and, penetrating her heart, caused instant death.

—— The Davenport Brothers have brought an action against one of the Paris papers, which exposed their pretensions. This looks as if they had made more money during the last year than they had use for.

—— The erection of a statue to Dr. Simpson, as discoverer of chloroform, is exciting some interest in foreign medical circles. The French doctors say that one M. Soubeiran is the original discoverer.

—— A disease has made its appearance among the hares, rabbits, and other species of game in England, which is killing them off rapidly. What with the plague among beef and mutton, another epidemic among the horses, the rabbits running round with no hair on their backs, and the rising of the Fenians, John Bull is greatly worried.

—— It is stated that Garibaldi recently caused two of his horses to be sold at the public market in Genoa. King Victor Emmanuel having learned what was going to occur, gave orders to purchase the two animals, which brought 3,000f., and then offered them as a present to the General. The latter, however, positively refused to receive them.

—— The wife of John Barlow, in London, England, has a baby five weeks' old which has two heads. The second head is attached to the first in such a manner that the least twist or sudden movement would cause immediate death. The poor mother is unable to lay it down without fear, and unable to dress it without the assistance of another person.

—— It has been calculated that venders of roasted chestnuts to the number of about 400 arrived in Paris from the south of France in the course of the month of September, and that each of them sells on an average 40 bags of chestnuts, weighing 100 kilogrammes each.

—— A brutal sport has been revived in Paris, termed "cock throwing." A cock is attached to a cord, fixed to a stake driven in the ground. A heap of stones is placed at a short distance, and for two sous any one has a right to five throws at the unfortunate bird, which remains the prize of the marksman who kills it. In most cases the bird is tortured dreadfully before an end is put to its existence.

—— A London paper publishes a description of a curious invention designed to catch safe burglars. The depredator no sooner commences, in perfect ignorance of the secret arrangements, to force open the door, drill the lock or move the safe, than by so doing he sends a telegraph message to the nearest police office, exhibiting the number of the safe he is attacking, and this number, registered in the police books, has opposite to it the address of the house in which the robbery is being effected.

—— A fearful giant in the shape of a barnyard fowl has been introduced into Scotland from Central India, called the "Begum Gauysa." The male is 30 inches high, and appears like the Shanghae, except that on the head two minute horns rise, instead of a comb, from a heavy base which projects some distance along the upper side of the bill. The wattles are also larger, and fuller. The chickens of this kind of fowl, it is reported, grow to the weight of eight pounds at seven and eight months old, limbs of course included.

—— The Dublin correspondent of the London Times says: "It is rather dangerous to use the word 'Fenian' in this country now. A short time ago, a gentleman jocosely told a policeman he looked like a Fenian, whereupon the gentleman was arrested and taken to the station-house."

—— The Bey of Tunis is indefatigable in his duties. He judges causes every Saturday and Monday. One Saturday recently he decided in three hours no less than 150 cases, which at one time it would have taken years to settle.

THE EXECUTION OF WIRZ.

ON Friday, the 10th instant, this notorious criminal, who has, without doubt, directly caused more loss of life than any man that ever lived, expiated his crimes on the scaffold in the yard of the Old Capitol Prison, Washington City. At ten o'clock his spiritual advisers, Fathers Wiggett and Boyle, administered the sacrament, after which Wirz was informed by Captain Walbridge that his time had arrived, and he submitted himself to the black robe and cowl, which was put on by Captain Walbridge and Major Russell, while Fathers Boyle and Wiggett stood by. He then drank from a tea cup a heavy dose of whisky; nervously gnawed a piece from a plug of tobacco, which he threw back on the shelf; cast a hurried glance around the apartment, out at the window where the sun shone on the town, turned, and with a light step, walked past the guard at his door into the hall, accompanied on either hand by his faithful spiritual advisers, who consoled with words and the sight of the crucifix. At a turn of the stairs he caught sight, through an open window, of the gallows and the expectant crowd. A momentary start or shrinking, as if from a shock, and he passed on, with that expression of countenance mistaken by many for a smile, but which, in reality, is far from it. Thus he came to the door of the room of Winder and Duncan—other Andersonville birds—and was suffered by the humane commandant to have a last word with them.

Wirz then passed on down the stairs, out between the files of men, facing outward, up to the scaffold, showing something in his face and step which, in a better man, might have passed for heroism.

As he advanced all conversation was hushed, and the sombre-draped figure marched on between the rows of soldiers, sending a chill through the hearts of all that looked upon the scene.

The condemned had been draped with the shapeless robe of serge which has figured in all the executions known to the walls of the Old Capitol Prison, and which, drawn closely about the chin, increased the natural pallor of the face, and made the appearance of the man still more repulsive and indefinable. His whiskers closely cropped, lips apart and his closed teeth, black with the use of tobacco, eyes sunken, forehead retreating, and topped with disheveled and untidy hair, added to the wierdness of the look he has worn daily at his trial, and that has impressed all who have ever seen him

Then commenced the enumeration of his crimes, to which he seemed stolidly to listen, while Father Boyle bent over him occasionally and pressed a small crucifix to his lips. For eighteen minutes this scene lasted, when his hand was shaken by the reverend fathers, and by Major Russell and Capt. Walbridge; his arms were drawn back and pinioned close, the rope was thrown over his head, and the black shroud drawn. All retired from the platform, leaving only Wirz, who, standing thus eight or ten seconds, when the officer below raised his cap as a signal, and there was a crash of the falling trap, a sudden jerk and tension of the rope, and a dark and lengthened form swung convulsively beneath the scaffold. For a moment there was a hush upon the multitude within, and the people upon adjacent house-tops, as all eyes noted the spasmodic twitching of the lower parts of the criminal's body, and some strong-nerved man in the crowd made an audible calculation of the number of tremors that passed through the frame before life became totally extinct. Then came something like a cheer from beyond the prison walls, where all available objects commanding a view of the scene within, were crowded with citizens and soldiers, and gradually there was lifted from the nearer spectators the awe occasioned from seeing a life pass violently from most infamous manhood to the darkest valley of the shadow of death, and there was a hum of comment acccompanied with a general crowding nearer the scaffold.

Fifteen minutes more passed without material event. The people who had been on the roofs of houses and in the branches of trees, together with considerable numbers from the prison, retired from the contemplation of the scene, leaving only a few officers and a large group of the members of the press to witness the last of the tragedy. About a quarter to eleven a surgeon approached the pendant body, carefully raised the lower part of the hood, and peered for a little time into the dead man's face, and felt for the flutter of his pulse. There was no spark of animation remaining. The rope was made to loose its throttle, and the body was lowered upon a hospital stretcher, and carried past the crowd into the dead-house of the prison. The guard was brought to "attention," and filed out of the court, leaving the spectators in undisturbed possession of the field, quarreling and elbowing each other for fragments of the rope that performed the sacrifice. Not five minutes elapsed before the executionary cable was severed into inch bits that accompanied the delighted possessors from the field. And thus ended the execution of Henri Wirz, whose name will go down to posterity, accompanied by the execrations of thousands.

WOLFE'S MONUMENT—QUEBEC.

There is always a certain admiration felt by a brave people for a gallant man, and although the nation for which the hero of Quebec fought, has long ago ceased to be part and parcel of our national creed, yet at the time when he fell he was regarded as one of our own soldiers, and all that was disposable of our forces were co-operating with him as a colony contingent.

The site of his monument is on the environs of Quebec. It was a pillar about ten feet in height, and was erected where tradition declared that Wolfe breathed his last. It was originally inscribed,

"Here died Wolfe Victorious."

But this was soon mutilated to such a degree that about fifteen years ago the present monument was erected, which is about forty-eight feet in height, and surmounted by a bronze helmet, and sword. The inscription is now

"Here died Wolfe in the arms of Victory."

THE BALLOON WEDDING.

WEDNESDAY, the 8th of Nov., ushered in the long talked of Aerial wedding, under the supervision of Professor Lowe, of aeronautic fame.

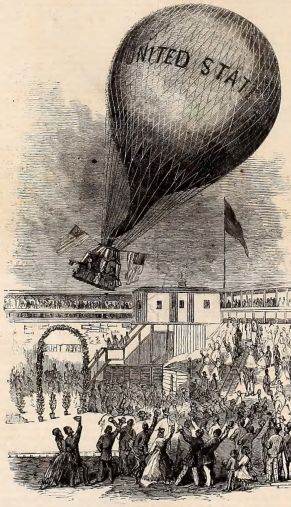
The inflation of the balloon commenced at an early hour, but before one o'clock it was found that the immense quantity of gas necessary to inflate the huge balloon "United States" (75,000 feet), could not be generated rapidly enough, and, as a consequence, reserves was had to the ordinary gas from the street mains. In the meantime the people began to gather, and soon the enclosure had within it 4,000 people, while every shed and house-top about was crowded, to say nothing of 20,000 people in the park.

The curious took a view of the car, which in itself was very handsome. The canopy was of orange and blue brocatelle, and the valance covering the lower part of the car, of orange and crimson brocatelle. The curtains were of white lace, and were handsomely ornamented with artificial red and white roses, orange blossoms, and crimson and blue tassels, and a handsome carpet covered the floor, while the seats were covered with green silk, and the cords of the car with red, white and blue ribbons. At the same time the bridal party, who were, as we announced last week, Miss Mary West Jenkins, of St. Louis, and Professor John F. Boynton, of Syracuse, were enjoying themselves at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. At two o'clock a florist made his appearance, loaded down with his stock, and commenced decorating the enclosure and car. At three o'clock the audience grew impatient for the consummation, and shouted for the happy pair, and the ballast was taken from the balloon. At about four o'clock two pretty little girls appeared on the platform, and commenced scattering flowers. They were dressed in white with a profusion of spangles, and wore white roses and orange blossoms in their hair. Following these came the bride and groom, the first a pretty girl of about 22; the last a sharp, wide-awake-looking man, about twice that age.

The bride wore a dress of the richest poplin, of that peculiar and beautiful tint known as ashes of roses. It was handsomely trimmed with rich velvet a shade darker. Hat of silk the same shade, with gloves to match. Ornaments, Oriental pearl earrings and torquoise brooch. Miss Jenkins, that was, is about 22 years of age, in figure tall and commanding. Her complexion is fresh and clear, her eyes of a lustrous hazel, and hair of the silkiest brown contrasts finely with a neck of swan-like whiteness. The irrepressible waterfall was, as a necessity, present with all its magnitude, while that portion of her hair which was not contained in this cataract of splendor was frizzled over her forehead, so as to bring out in bold relief a brow where intellectuality of a high order displayed itself. Without being what an ordinary observer would call beautiful, there is an inexpressibly sweet smile continually hovering about her lips, which gives to her face a sufficiently beautiful expression to class her among the fairest of Columbia's daughters. Though her dress was peculiar for a bride, it must be remembered it was rendered excusable by the circumstances connected with her marriage. To proceed on a wedding tour in gauze and tarleton, when that tour was to be taken in a balloon on a chill November day, would be at once unsuited and ridiculous.

The bridegroom was dressed in a plain suit of black, and looked as complacent over his position as though he enjoyed it.

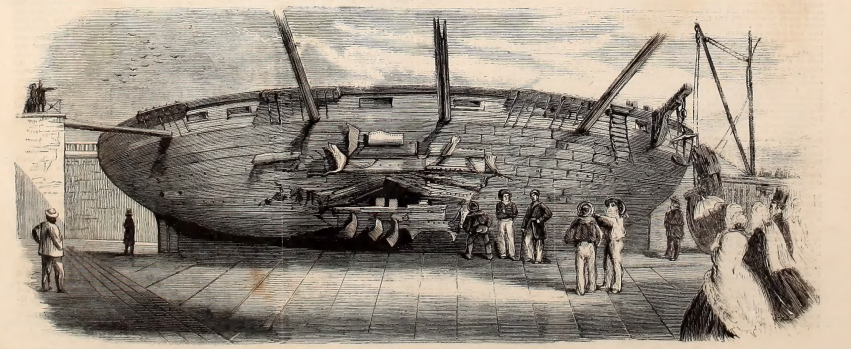
At this juncture a wedding cake and certain other edibles were brought forward, and presented to the happy couple, and they took their places in the car.



It was then announced that the wedding would not, as was generally supposed by the public, take place in mid air, but that the parties had just been married at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. This was greeted with evidence of disapprobation by the crowd, but the idea was soon lost in the preparations for the trip.

At last the word was given to cast loose, and the party, consisting of the bride and groom, Professor Lowe and one bridesmaid, soared away into the clouds, amid the cheers of the thousands of spectators.

They landed in about two hours at Mount Vernon, Westchester County, and returned to the city the same evening, and so ended the great Aerial wedding.



THE BALLOON WEDDING—THE RECEPTION.

THE BALLOON WEDDING—THE ASCENSION.

THE BLOWING UP OF THE TERPSICHORE.

We last week described the effect produced upon the Terpsichore by the explosion of a torpedo beneath her bottom in the Medway, at Chatham, England. We now publish an engraving showing the damage done to the hull of the vessel. The astonishing effect of the explosion, as exhibited externally, raises a question as to the possibility of resisting the influence of torpedoes by strengthening the bottom of ships. This, however, would appear to be useless, as the power of the torpedos can be increased at pleasure; where these engines of destruction can be brought to bear, they would seem to bid defiance to any strength of fabric. The bottom of the Terpsichore was not only blown in, but the midship portion of the lower deck was literally forced upwards, everything flying before the force of the explosion. The only feasible defence against the influence of these torpedos appears to be, to keep a "bright look-out" on board ships when blockading or attacking a fort or other object, so as to prevent the machine being placed sufficiently near to be dangerous. This, of course, is supposing that the torpedos will be attempted to be "planted" after ships have taken up a position; but equal precaution would be necessary in approaching a hostile port, lest the roadway should be studded with the dangerous machines, which, constructed on the percussion principle, would be exploded by contact with the ship's bottom, as she passed over them.

EFFECTS OF THE TORPEDO EXPLOSION ON THE TERPSICHORE, AT CHATHAM, ENGLAND.

A BUSH FIRE IN AUSTRALIA.

THE prairie fires of our western country are as well-known to us as the conflagrations of our cities, but the bush fires of Australia, are little known, and, even to those who have witnessed the western fires on the prairies, are novelties that are well worth recording.

These fires originate in about the same manner as the fires on the prairie, either by the action of some settler who wishes to burn away the grass and underbrush, to save himself the trouble of clearing, or by the act of some traveler who is careless with his fire when making his wayside meal. The result is the same, the fire once started sweeps over a vast extent of country, and everything dies before it. Kangaroos, especially, which are to be found in thousands, fly before the flame, mixed indiscriminately with carnivorous animals, serpents and birds of a thousand plumages that fill the air.

The same as in the prairie fires, sometimes these conflagrations sweep into inhabited districts and dwellings and human life fall before it.

FORT UNION, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

THIS stronghold of the St. Louis Fur Company was built in 1843, six miles above the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, on the banks of the Missouri. The grounds belonging to the fort are partly in Idaho and partly in Dacotah, the fort being located exactly on the line.

In 1864 it was garrisoned by the United States, the company still continuing its trade.

The North Western Indian Expedition reached that fort on its return in August, 1864, where it was provisioned for its journey to the States.

TOLD STUYVESANT PEAR TREE.

THIS ancient tree, and landmark of New York, stands on the corner of Thirteenth-st. and Third avenue, and is still in a flourishing condition, this year having borne fruit. It was planted by Peter Stuyvesant, Governor of New York, exactly 250 years ago, and stood in front of the porch of his house, and under its shade the one-legged hero sat, and smoked his pipe and quaffed his lager.

The tree has been protected from ruthless hands by an iron railing, and bids fair yet for a hundred years of life.

A BUSH FIRE IN AUSTRALIA—FLIGHT OF THE KANGAROOS.

Waiting for Sherman's Army.

BY HANNAH MULLER.

THERE was a wedding in Savannah. Margaret Gray stood near the chancel, looking with flashing, indignant eyes at the bride who advanced up the aisle, with her fair hair falling over dazzling white shoulders, and her blue eyes cast down. She had had a stormy interview with Alice that morning—stormy on her side, but carried off with perfect good humor on the part of the bride.

Margaret had gone round in the morning to help Alice Lee with her preparations for the bridal. She was curling the long, fair hair, over her fingers, when Alice said:

"Do you remember, Margaret, a time when you and all your friends thought I should soon be performing this kind office for you—a time, four years ago."

"Yes," the other answered, with a sigh half suppressed.

"Yes, you say, and nothing more. Why not be a little more talkative? Why not give me an opportunity to say something which is on my tongue to tell you?"

"Say on," answered Margaret, in that tone usual with people who have nothing more to hope or fear.

"Ah, well, you see I am very happy," said Alice, "I am going to marry Bernard, who is, after all, the best and bravest of all the lovers I have ever had. I can afford to give you a little satisfaction. Robert Norton never offered himself to me, Margaret."

"What do you say," said the other, letting the long ringlet fall, and coming round to face Alice. "What do you say, Alice?"

"Ah, now patience. You brown-eyed girls are so fierce; go on curling my hair, else I shall not be ready for Bernard when he comes."

"What do you say?" repeated Margaret, looking close into the soft, blue eyes, now quailing a little under that steadfast regard.

"Margaret," said Alice, recovering herself, and laughing a sweet, careless laugh. "I could no more answer while you stand there looking at me than I could keep my self-possession if a young lioness rose up to face me. Do, like a good girl, go on curling my hair, then I will make a clean breast of it. Perhaps you will scold me for being a very naughty child, but Bernard will kiss me when he comes, and I shall forget the scolding."

Margaret did as Alice asked, and began brushing the soft hair over fingers cold and white as marble, while her eyes shone out glowing and impatient from the pale face, which had lost every tint of color.

"Well, you see," said Alice, "I liked Robert Norton: came very near loving him; and when he followed you home from New York I made up my mind that his fiery, impatient nature would not suit half so well with your coldness and dignity as with my more impulsive character. You see I am all Southern, you all Northern in temperament; so I did my best to win him. To tell you the truth, I thenght you could never care much for any man, and would soon get over it if he did forsake you. I could not succeed in making him love me at all, but I did succeed in keeping him so much with me, always saying that you had sent to ask if he would escort me hither and thither (a harmless little fib, Madge), that you began to be jealous and uneasy, though you never spoke his name to me, no matter how much I used to tease you about him when we two were alone in our room at nights. You grew so very cold to him that I saw it affected his manner towards you, and I knew from your sad face after he had gone, to return again in three weeks, that you two must have had a cool parting."

"For heaven's sake," said Alice, "don't make a noise like that again, or I shall never have courage to keep to my virtuous resolution, and tell you what may give Robert another chance; that letter I read to you was not from him at all. It came in very apropos, for you remember it spoke of wishing to break off another engagement, which had become hateful to him for my sake. It happened, however, that letter came from another of my numerous admirers. I remember how you came to me the next day with a note you had written to Robert, saying with a tremulous voice, 'You have a right to see this, Alice!' and how glad I felt that there was not a word in it which could implicate me—not a word of explanation, only just giving him up. How proud you were, Margaret, and how miserable. You, so sure that he must know your reason for breaking the engagement, while he, I suppose, took it for granted from your coldness before he left, that you had ceased to care for him. I never saw him again, Madge; he never returned to S——; so I might have spared myself all the trouble I went through on his account. I remember how glad you were to leave home at once, and come right down here to stay with mother, while I remained at the North with your father. It is three years now since I returned home, Margaret, and you have never asked me a word about Robert. I suppose you thought I had refused him. I know that I told you I should, for I was quite aware that it was a risky game I was playing, and that my chances were very uncertain."

Not a word was spoken by the tall, dark-eyed girl who stood behind Alice, still brushing the soft curls like one in a dream, so the pretty prattler went on in a sweet low voice—"It was a curious thing, Madge, that you never should have said a word about old times, when you saw me flirting with so many different men, and you have stayed here so long in Savannah, busy with that horrid teaching, while your whole heart, independent even of Robert Norton, has been in the North, the 'blessed North,'—as you call it—when your father came to take you home and died here. That seemed to fix you in this place, where his grave is, and there you stand behind me in your black dress, like a shadow. When will you ever leave off that dismal mourning. It is provoking, because you see it prevents me from having my cousin Madge for bridesmaid.

"Alice, your hair is finished, let me help you with your dress—quick, I want to go."

"I wish you would leave Mrs. Allen's, Margaret. I don't like my cousin to be a governess (and Bernard won't like it)—although Mrs. A. is very kind to you and loves you, I believe, much better than me. Now, child, do talk to me a little or I shall repent having been good and telling you."

"I have nothing to say," answered Margaret, "this is your holiday, and you look very happy and exceedingly pretty—let that satisfy you."

"Oh, thank you," said the sweet-looking girl, who now stood before the mirror and surveyed herself—at the same time dropping a curtsey to her cousin, whose pale face looked over her white shoulder, almost agonized. "I declare, Madge, the sight of your face gives me the shivers; who knows? Robert Norton has gone into the army, who knows but you will be another here with Sherman's army, which people say is, some day, really coming to Savannah?"

"Be quiet, Alice—do not speak another word to me—silence, or God forgive you, I never will. You know how all these years I have suffered pain, from which I would have been glad to escape even by the cruelest death. And now you tell me with your sweet, low voice—you subtle enemy!—a thing which stabs me to the heart, and there is no help for it. Oh, child, 'no help for it,' and I bore it quietly, that pain of thinking he had ceased to love me, of believing that those blue eyes and charming smile had robbed me of him. I thought, too, that he was, perhaps, suffering just as I. Suffering because your little heart was not given to him. I prayed that I was to dream that my hero could be miserable for the sake of such a one as you. But how shall I bear this pain to know that he has believed, through all this long, weary time, that I was the unfaithful one."

"Margaret," said the other, interrupting her, and quite serious now, "I would have told you all this long ago, but I knew that you were too proud even to write to Robert, to make the matter straight, and I thought it would only make you unkind to me, without helping either you or him. I am not a courageous girl, and I don't think I could tell you now, if you were not like a sister to me, and he married, and Bernard will make up to me for losing your friendship if you choose to withdraw that."

"Friendship! Don't say the word, what do you know about friendship? What about love? You are taken up with your cards, and your jewels. You are taken up with your blue eyes, and the conquests they make. Is such an one as you responsible if you happen to be the cause of an agony you cannot imagine or understand, are you answerable for the deep, incurable wound your little soft fingers can make. Truly I believe not. I cannot put a name capable of imagining the pain. You take Bernard because there are fewer admirers in the way at present, and Bernard is not a man to be trifled with. You know what love is! No, not even in your dreams!"

"But I would have loved Robert Morton, if he had cared for me," said Alice, in a low voice.

"Alice, never say that name to me again. Good, bye, we are cousins, and must be civil to each other, but I shall go home to the North soon, and shall never—never meet you anymore. I shall apply for the pass at once. I cannot bear to remain in the same city with you. Every time we should meet it would be as if you stabbed me again. I shall apply for a pass to the North at once."

"Had you not better wait for Sherman's army?" said Alice, as the door closed behind Margaret.

Margaret now stood in the church, while the wedding was going on, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, but some low passionate words she spoke long ago, turning with a pang from the remembrance, as she kept repeating to herself the words, "There is no help for it. Ah, me, no help for it." Feeling that she and Robert Norton were just as much parted as if the facts had really been what she had represented them to be. And four years had past. Ah, yes, he must be married now; somewhere his happy wife was living and little children—his little children were playing at her feet.

"Whom God has joined together let no man put asunder," said the minister; the words came to her in just the same way as they had done when in past on Bernard's thoughts of the woman who called Robert, Margaret's Robert, "husband." Ah, yes, she would take that as an assurance that he was married, and there was nothing more in the world for her, but why should she grieve, she was only just in the same place as yesterday. Nothing more had happened, things were only just as they had been for these four long years, but this city had become too painful a place for her to live in. She could not stay any longer in Savannah, and then in spite of herself, she could not help hearing, like an echo repeating itself, the words:

"Better wait for Sherman's army, Madge."

Sherman's army. What was there in Sherman's army except a victory for her blessed country, except the power which would restore to the fair soil of Georgia its birthright, which would plant again the old, dear flag to wave over its cities, over its broad fields and silent, solemn forests which would consecrate again the land in whose bosom her father lay asleep. All this she had expected and hoped for, during the four years which had passed, of all this she had felt certain always.

What new thoughts was there added to this—"Sherman's army." Amongst its ten thousands, who was it whom she personally cared to see? Was it the father of these little children she had been thinking of a while ago? The husband of that happy wife she had pictured to herself?

The ceremony was over, the people all flocked out of the church, and Bernard Turner had gained a pretty, blue-eyed wife to sit by his fireside and amuse him with her little talk. How long would the amusement last? How long before he, too, would sit quiet sometimes, and say to himself with a sigh, "There is no help for it. Ah, me, no help for it."

Margaret sat down on the chancel step, it was nearly evening now, solemn twilight in the old church, and she forgot how time was passing. There was to be service in the evening, and so the old sexton did not light the church doors. Service, and the same prayer which she had to listen to every Sunday, would be read, that prayer to which she would not listen as she declined head and heart knee. She was startled by the first stroke of the bell ringing, and noticed how dark it had grown. She must rise up now, and leave the dear cherished dream—dreamed so long ago—behind her again, for there was no more help for it. There seemed to be an unusual stir in the streets, as if people hurrying to and fro. She went to the door, and noticed that there was great commotion. People talking in knots—anxious, excited looks—moving quickly in knots—anxious, excited looks—moving quickly in another direction. An old free negro who knew her and used to call her, "That bressed Yankee girl" passed at the moment.

"What is the matter, Caleb?"

"Bress the good, glorious, God Almighty, missey, if that dar bressed Sherman's army isn't a-coming all dis way."

"Oh, Margaret," said Pauline Allen, who came to the church door with her partner, "we have been looking everywhere for you, and do you know the news? They say that Sherman's army is not going to Augusta at all. Augusta is strongly fortified, and the people are so frightened. We are going into the country, as soon as we are sure it is near up among the Pines. Oh, I wish, I wish Bernard Turner was not so terribly afraid. Julia and Ruth don't care, for they are so delighted at the thought of getting to the country to-morrow, that they can't sleep. Margaret. And just think, Bernard Turner has to turn soldier this very evening—has to go out and drill. Alice has gone home already, she did not like to leave him and go to the Pines with us. If I were in her place I would not do that, no matter how much I was afraid."

In the midst of all this excitement a thankfulness came over Margaret's spirit which was almost like joy. Now she could go out with the crowd unchanging. Sherman's army! "No, she would not go to the Pines, she would stay behind, and walk gladly home by the streets with the old flag waving overhead again. And if there were a fierce struggle first, and the conquering, undiscriminating shot should spend her soul with all it was worth, what matter? The happy husbands and wives, the little children growing up, would neither need nor miss her care and sympathy.

"Margaret does not go with us we do, Pauline," said Mrs. Allen, looking a little sadder at the face lighted up by the excited feelings.

"Yes, Mrs. Allen, I think with you, but I am glad for you, glad for all the inhabitants of this mistaken land, that the morning is dawning for them through the clouds of war—peace will return to them once more. I will stay here, Mrs. Allen. These are my people who are coming. Poor people, I will not desert them in their need. People who bring with them no unkind and revengeful feelings, who are ready to claim every man here as a brother and every woman as a sister. I had found now. Oh, Mrs. Allen, would that this city would receive them at its gates with a welcome."

Mrs. Allen shook her head. "That is a vain wish, my child."

And the evening service was read, with its prayers for their enemies, but Margaret was not thinking of any part of it, she was only thinking, with a throbbing heart, of "Sherman's army!"

And so the days went on, each one bringing more excitement. Armed men pouring into the city from the direction of Augusta, and cut off to parts unknown; women and children flying.

"For heaven's sake come with us, Margaret," said Mrs. Allen; "I will not be left in terrible battle. Do you suppose, when the Yankees are outside the walls, that they will care whether their shot kill a Secessionist woman or not? Oh, child! Will they stop to ask whether there are any loyal people in camp? Come with us, my child."

"I cannot, I cannot, Mrs. Allen, I must stay here."

"Do you realize that they will take our homes as quarters for their officers; you cannot stay here alone."

"I will go to old Hannah's cottage. No harm will come to me there."

Mrs. Allen made other unavailing efforts to prevail upon Margaret to accompany them; the girl only answered, "I cannot go, I cannot go." She was left free.

She took her few things to old Hannah's cottage, and stayed there through the days of suspense, never flinching at the sound of the cannon; but the anxiety was soon over.

And at last came the march of Sherman's army through the streets. Past old Hannah's door filed the troops. Margaret stood and looked out of the window with a wild throbbing heart, for there she noticed among the officers, faces of acquaintances not seen for long years, and in the ranks, soldiers whom she had known as young men in those days gone by. She felt like running out to clasp the hands grown browner and rougher in the many years of hardship, to ask the fate of the long marches those weary men had made, and of the wives and mothers, and the betrothed left at home, dreary in the absence of Sherman's army." She thought of the comrades who had dropped out of the ranks on their weary way, and forgot, for a little time, that she was nothing but a poor and lonely girl, who did not know whether Robert Norton, lost to her for ever, was in this world or the next.

After this, the days went on quietly, people began to go about the streets again, and some of the shops were reopened. There was no confusion or tumult, all went well under the control of "Sherman's army." Mrs. Allen wrote, begging Margaret to apply at headquarters for a pass permitting her and her family to return to Savannah, and to her home, which had remained unmolested, Margaret having moved in there with old Hannah the day after the troops entered the city.

So she set off one morning for headquarters, quite unattended, except for Hannah's little boy, Pomp. She walked sadly along the street now, the first excitement was over, and her thoughts the first excitement was over, and her thoughts were sad and look at her own loneliness, her own desolation, which had seemed to grow greater every day, since she had told that little history of the past. She began to realize that she had been longing for Sherman's army with some faint personal hope, lest sight of in that first great realization, but leaving its disappointment to do its own work on a frame already worn out with long endurance.

The tramp did not pay much attention to his mistress, he got absorbed in a company of infantry filing down the street with colors flying, and Margaret, thinking her own thoughts, passed on out of sight.

She did not notice that she was quite alone till she reached the house where the military governor's head-quarters had been fixed. She went in without fear, and waited for her turn to go forward, but there were a great many soldiers about, and some of them scanned her rather inquisitively, trying to see her face through the double crape veil which covered it.

"Stand back," said a stern voice, and an officer came forward. There was a double row of buttons on his coat, and a stained silver sash on his shoulder. Others in waiting touched their caps and retreated immediately.

Everything grew dark before Margaret's dizzy eyes, but she heard the stern voice speak kindly to her, and recovered herself. She stood in the shade, and no one could have recognized her through the thick black veil; but its heavy folds hid her shuddering shut eyes from her sight that dear, remembered face—familiar still, through all these years of separation and estrangement.

"The general will see you now, that you are here for a pass. You would be obliged to wait for some time, and this is no place for a lady; too many rude soldiers about. If you will give me your address, I will procure the pass, and send it to you."

Margaret took out of her pocket a card on which the address was already written; not her own name, but Mrs. Allen's, with the number and the street.

Then she had handed it to him, she turned away without a word, and went out into the street again.

"And that is all," she thought, "that one brief sight of him, and nothing more."

It was a great agony to turn away from him, when she had thought that dear hand once again; no matter, even if he were married, it would have been a joy to her just to hear one kind word from him. Margaret—but that was for should be alive and well, that was surely great cause for thanksgiving; and she walked along the streets with a throbbing heart, the world lay inside and a little city of Savannah—with an impatient, nervous dread at her heart that something would call Robert Norton away, that she should have no chance of ever hearing him again.

Colonel Norton looked after the slender, retreating figure with a sigh. It minded him of one he had known long ago, many, many long ago, and had never seen again—of one whom he thought of as being now far away in her Northern home—and, in spite of the unmistakable rejection she had sent him, and wondered for whose sake it had been written, whom she had married. He had always called cautious, but he was not; he had left her, and would have been too painful for him ever to go there again, and had never spoken her name since they parted. Now she had brought, wherever she is, and whoever she loves. He felt annoyed that this woman—Southern woman, he called her —should come to him, Margaret who had given him up in times gone by, and whom he had been trying so long to forget. The motion of her little gloved hand as she handed him the card—the pure and swift movement of her head as she turned to go away—it was so like. Ah! what matter?—it was nothing. What was that Southern woman's name. He took the card out of his pocket; there was a slight odor of violets about it—that was like Margaret, too. "Mrs. Allen" the name was—struck. All right; he would do what he could to please Mrs. Allen. But what was he to do—something about a pass—he knew nothing so far—that he had entirely forgotten; if, indeed, she had ever told him. She had retreated so suddenly; frightened perhaps at the rude looks of Sherman's soldiers. For his part he had not even seen her face. She might be black for all he knew. She had not told him her name, only Mrs. Allen, a name in the dark, then. Must he go up and see Mrs. Allen, to inquire? He went into the office, feeling rather glad that anyone should have forgotten that which would make it necessary for him to call, and sat through the afternoon smoking his cigar, and thinking his own thoughts of Margaret, who had lost long ago, and wondering what kind of a face Mrs. Allen had hidden behind that double black veil. When it was time to go home he got up again, and looked at the number, then walked leisurely up the street.

Margaret sat in the pleasant parlor; she would not let Hannah light the gas; the firelight suited her better. She, too, was thinking of her own thoughts of going, and had turned to sorrows now; half despairing, half rejoicing that she had caught a glimpse of that dear face again. She heard the bell ring, and Hannah go to the door; then a voice which made her stand up trembling and sick with expectation. Oh, he must not go away; she must see him, and she could not move a step.

"Is Mrs. Allen at home?" asked the voice.

"No," said Hannah.

The visitor seemed to be hesitating as Hannah still held the door open.

Margaret's temples throbbed so as almost to prevent her hearing.

"I must see Mrs. Allen on business. Can you tell me when she will be at home?"

"No, sir; but if you will wait a moment, I will speak to young miss about it. Miss Margaret, here is an officer who wishes to see Mrs. Allen. Ah, such a fine, brave gentleman," added Hannah, in a low tone, for Margaret's ears only. "It went against me to shut the door on him, but I did it, and there he stands as patient as a lamb. Do, young miss, go and speak to him."

"Tell him to come in," said Margaret, but she could not raise her voice above a whisper.

She had time to ask him in, and she stood there in the middle of the room, expectant of she knew not what, trembling in every limb, and dizzy eyes, so that she could hardly hear or see.

Colonel Norton came in and stood near her; it began to talk of Mrs. Allen and the pass; just then the door closed.

"Margaret," he said.

But she stood there before him, just looking up into his face, nothing more.

"Margaret. Oh, child, tell me that you are not Mrs. Allen."

She shook her head.

"Margaret Gray," she said.

His face glowed.

"Do you forget all the past?" he asked.

"No," she whispered; then, with a new courage, she looked up into his eyes.

"Not Alice, then," she said, "too late for any happiness, but you must listen, Robert."

She told him how it was, but finished her story with her head declined on his shoulder.

"And you may go now, my darling," she said, "it all comes too late. It must be that you have forgotten me for Alice; but I had to make it all clear to you, the reason for that letter which it broke my heart to write you."

"You just said, Madge? Too late to ask for the priest's blessing to-night; but I may bring him to-morrow, may I?"

There came a refusal from the lips that were close against his cheek now, and Margaret made no resistance against the arm which held her so closely.

"We soldiers, make a short wooing, my darling," he said, "and I mean to take you away with 'Sherman's Army.'"

IRISH AND HIGHLAND WIT.

"WHAT creatures those Irish are!" said the landlord, as he knocked a feather of white ashes from the tip of his cheroot; "it would be a hard task without the cat, for a single Irishman at a station is enough to banish bliss devils. The presence of an Irishman anywhere keeps away low spirits, just as a cat is a sure remedy for sour rats and mice. Every station should have an Irishman as an unrelenting quarantine!" "I were an Irishman as an unrelenting quarantine!"

"I have had a good deal both in Ireland and the Highlands," said Fen, "and the intellectual difference between the two races has often struck me as a little curious. Both are of the same stock originally, antiquarians say, and yet Ireland is a land of Goshen overflowing with milk and honey of humor, whereas in every quality of humor the Highlands are as dry as the Sahara. Jokes don't usually come further north than Inverness. One or two are occasionally to be found in Ross-shire, over there; but they are far from common, and their presence is chronicled in the same way as the appearance of the caperzellie is chronicled. No joke has yet been found strong-winged enough to cross the Kyle. That's old, at least."

"But have not the Highlanders wit?"

"Oh, yes, plenty of it, but rather of the sternness than of the sparkling kind; their wit is born for the most part of anger and contempt. 'There she goes,' mirrored in the Highland mind, would be laughed at in Dublin at a fair. 'There she lies,' referred Duncan, as he knocked the scorner over at a fair. 'Sandy Macdonald's wife has had a baby,' reported, proceeding on a sacrament Sunday to the Free Church, and meeting his friend coming from the Established. 'Donald Macleod has got a stitch in the torn coat, since the scanty purse, boils in the pot which he is seemed to laugh about. The best Highlander can draw no amelioration of comedy from the process of retaining a torn garment and stitching, but both this is the hardest ship I ever was in is all he will say. Highlander would laugh, and believe that the joke made the hard plank all the sweeter for the stitch.

"And how do you account for this difference?"

"I can't account for it, for it is. The two springing from the same stock, I think it is rather unaccountable unless, indeed, it be the Establishment. Ireland, a Roman province, rainy Erin producing rant and exultant natures; the Highlands, a Highland province, Celtic natures."

"There is one quality, however, in which your Highlander runs Irish, and that is the exception, perhaps, to the North American Indian."

"What quality is that?"

"The quality of never exhibiting astonishment. The Highlander will see a comet, or a meteor, or a flying fish, without expressing astonishment at anything. Take a Highland drover from the wilds of Sutherlandshire, and bring him to Cheapside, and he will relish the most perfect equanimity. He will have no more than the most perfect equanimity, and the vehicle; the Thames Tunnel will not move him, nor will lock on St. Paul's without will not move him, nor will lock on St. Paul's without wonder. The boy may have only ridden in a rear-cart, but he takes a railway train, the hydraulic bridges of the Britannia, and the bowling green of the tunnels, the speed of express lines in an hour over a tract of country that in ever beheld in his life, even from the elevated battlements of the mercat market, or from the unwonted of special remark."

"But the boy will be astonished all the same?"

"Of course he is. The very hair of his soul is standing on end with wonder and terror, but he will not betray it, nor let his top point. Will he allow the Sassenach to triumph over him? If he did he would not staunch to triumph over him? If he did he would not staunch to triumph over him? If he did he would not be his father's son, he will not admit that earth holds anything which he has not measured and weighed, and anything which he has not measured and weighed, and with which he is not familiar. When Chingachgook groans at the stake in the bearing of his tormentors, the Highlander will express surprise."

SHIPWRECKED.

BY AMANDA T. JONES.

I.

We two waited on the deck—
All around us rolled the sea;
Helpless on our reeling wreck,
Silent, wan, and worn were we.
Where the little boat went down,
Where the sun had plunged from sight,
Hope and light alike did drown.
O'er us, dark as Fate, was Night.
Face to face we stood alone,
Dreary, still and cold were we;
Smitten by that wild cyclone,
All around us beat the sea.
Rose the sea, rushed the sea,
Roared the wrathful sea.

II.

Cloudy shapes like hooded ghouls
Flitted past our shuddering prow,
Death was reaching for our souls,
Chill his breath upon the brow.
Then—oh, then, were we aware,
Through all war below, above,
Of a face sublimely fair!
Was it Death unveiled, or Love?
Heart to heart we stood aloof,
Smiling and scorned were we;
Tortured by that wild cyclone,
All around us strove the sea,
Wailed the sea, mourned the sea,
Sobbed the toiling sea.

III.

While we watched, a seething tide
O'er our sinking vessel crossed;
Out among the waters wide,
Smiling still, we two were tossed—
Tossed and drifted—overcome
In a crowd of surges dread,
Bruised and beaten, blind and dumb,
So we sank among the dead.
O my love, and mine alone,
Sweet it was to die with thee!
Far beneath that dread cyclone,
All around us rocked the sea,
Crept the sea, sank the sea,
Slept the silent sea.

IV.

Through our slumber, sweet and deep,
Stole the growing light of dawn;
Heart and brain its warmth did steep,
Out of Death our souls were drawn!
So we breathed—awoke—arose—
Heart to heart, and lip to lip;
Where Love's golden ocean flows
Ever sails our snowy ship.
Never sun so softly shone!
Fair, in saintly robes are we;
O'er us shrieks no mad cyclone,
All around us sings the sea—
Gleams the sea, glides the sea,
Laughs the lovely sea.

MARK RICHARDSON;

OR,

The Patriot's Trials.

A Legend of the Revolution.

BY L. A. WILMERE.

CHAPTER III.

COLONEL TARLETON had been making one of those tours of devastation through the country which associated his name with so much to be hated and feared by the whig inhabitants. Many of them, on the mere suspicion of being attached to the cause of liberty, were treated in the most barbarous manner. Their houses and barns were burned, their fields were laid waste, and their persons were subjected to the grossest indignities. Some who had been in arms were made prisoners, and sent to Charleston, where they were often compelled to undergo sufferings too shocking to humanity to be described.

On his return from this expedition, the odious and tyrannical colonel stopped for refreshment and repose at the house of that leading friend of royalty, Mark Richardson. Under a thin veil of external politeness, the natural brutality of the man's disposition was showed itself. During the space of two or three days at Richardson's, his true character was fully developed. The extraordinary beauty of Letitia made her the object of his pernicious passion. Unawed by that virtue which seemed to diffuse a sanctity on all around it, he dared to express his purposes, as one who presumed on his power, and who felt that his intended victim was cut off from all hope of escape or redress. He, however, with a repulse so decided and scornful, that his haughty and vindictive temper was fully aroused. His subsequent conduct showed, evidently, how loyalty had been perverted in a corrupt heart. The mode in which Tarleton's resentment discovered itself will be seen presently.

On the morning of the day which the colonel had fixed for his departure, he appeared at the breakfast-table with a lowering and ominous countenance. The meal was dispatched in silence, for all who knew aught of Tarleton's peculiarities saw plainly enough that a storm of some kind was brewing; and, although Currville and Richardson were unconscious of having given him any cause of dissatisfaction, they felt exceedingly uncomfortable; for to be suspected by a man of the colonel's temper was almost equivalent to being convicted.

After breakfast, Colonel Tarleton ordered one of his officers to "arrest that man," pointing to Carville. All, except Letitia, were amazed at this un specified order, but she instantly fathomed the mystery. Carville, after a moment of speechless astonishment, inquired if he was serious. Tarleton answered affirmatively, with a most impressive adjuration, and added:

"You have been detected in a treasonable correspondence with the rebels, and, having thus played the part of a spy, you will be dealt with by a summary process. The rope is spun that will hang you."

He glanced at Letitia, probably to see what effect this fearful denunciation against her father would have on her. The poor girl had swooned, and a smile of fiendish malignity played on the lips of her cruel persecutor.

Mr. Richardson here interposed:

"Colonel, this must be some mistake."

"No mistake at all, sir," answered Tarleton sharply. "The proofs are abundant and positive, and, if you would not be suspected of aiding and abetting his traitorous design, let me recommend you not to intercede in his behalf."

"I a traitor!" cried old Richardson. "Have I not endeavored to give up my own son as soon as he showed a disposition to join the rebels?"

"Oh, we understand the nature of your loyalty well enough!" cried Colonel Tarleton, who, according to one of the evil customs of the day, had indulged in several glasses of spirits before breakfast, and was now prepared to say what his fancy rather than his prudence and policy, suggested. "We know," he drawled out in a tone which revealed the state of his mind—"we know that you are held to the cause of King George only by fear and interest. You are traitors to your own countrymen, and what will prevent you from betraying us when it suits your purpose?"

"Colonel," said Richardson, "these are killing words—these are daggers to my heart. Never did I expect to hear such language from you."

"Ah, Richardson," said Tarleton, "you are a Falstaff in everything but age—a sly old rascal. Zounds, man, you have abundance of flesh, and, as of fruitly, I trust you—soon as far as you could run, by——; and it seems that your powers of locomotion are none of the most active. As for you, Carville, you are a thin rogue—pale, cadaverous, white-livered rascal. But you are about your treacherous work nimbly enough. But we have unearthed you, you old badger, and we will hang you up, together with the other vermin of the same sort. Possibly we may hang Richardson too, some day, if we can find a hawser strong enough for the purpose. Thin bodies of his son looks suspicious. Where did the young man get his fine notions of liberty?"

"Not from me," said Richardson; "did I not give information against him, and direct you how to find him?"

"Ay, but we did not get him," answered Tarleton, "your information led my men into an ambush, and lost ten of my very best fellows by your help. Might I not reasonably suspect that all this was a plot?"

The best Whig in the world might have pitied poor Richardson, who, in return for the essential services he had rendered to the cause of royalty, received nothing, by way of recompense, but the contumelious epithet of traitor from the lips of Colonel Tarleton. But the case of Carville was infinitely more deplorable. He stood in circumstances of the greatest peril, and the sure of a cruel and ignominious treatment at the hands of those who should have been his friends. Tarleton ordered him to make himself ready for traveling, as he was determined that he should be placed beyond all possibility of committing further treachery. Meanwhile, Letitia, having been restored to consciousness by the attentions of the females, received to accompany her father to Charleston, hoping, by her filial tenderness, to alleviate the sufferings which she too plainly foresaw would fall to his lot.

Colonel Tarleton, in the interim, had put his troop in marching order. A wagon, with a guard accompanying, was placed on a horse, and conveyed, like a felon, under a strong guard, in front of the cortege, being surrounded by the whole troop, with every circumstance of ignominious treatment that could be devised by those who had him in charge. The revolutionary Tories were held in great contempt, and both officers and men, when they could, and were often, on the slightest pretences, subjected to the grossest personal abuse, besides being liable to the unrequited plunder of their goods.

The resolution of Letitia to accompany her father was precisely what Colonel Tarleton had expected. She was not disappointed, and was treated completely in his power. She was not allowed to ride by her unfortunate parent, but was detained by Tarleton's own side, and, during the whole journey, taking a position by her side, and harrassing her with his odious protestations of love, plainly announcing to her at the same time that, under such behavior were changed, her father's life would be the forfeit.

Letitia did not even condescend to answer this infamous discourse, and in all the extremity of her grief and apprehension, she maintained a dignity which the military tyrant was compelled to respect, and, in his vile unable to perceive the nobility of the feeling.

Night had now set in, the feeble starlight scarcely sufficient to render the road visible, and the dense pine forest, on each side, rose in frowning masses, like two immense walls, that conveyed to the mind a narrow passage between them a preternatural gloom.

One might easily have imagined it to be an avenue to the abode of the dead, so solemn was the echo the plashing of the horses' feet in the pebbly sand. Tarleton and his officers soon began to speak of encamping for the night. In the woods, as soon as they could find a spot where the trees were sufficiently scattered. Letitia, whose thoughts during the day had been entirely upon her father, now began to realize the dangers of her own situation. Nothing could be more terrible to her than the idea of spending the night, without any protection (since her father was himself a helpless captive), among a band of rude soldiery, commanded by one who had shown himself inaccessible to every principle of honor, and every feeling of remorse. She begged permission to speak with her father, and, a few minutes being allowed her for that purpose, she explained to Carville the whole mystery of his captivity—the insults which had been offered her by the British Colonel—and the intensity of dread which she now felt. Carville's eyes were now opened to the extent of the injury which had been meditated against him; and he was infinitely more concerned on his daughter's account than on his own. His private wrongs did not admit of the enlightenment of his understanding than all the inflictions under which his country had suffered. He had endeavored to persuade himself that, by taking part with the royalists, he pursued the path marked out by justice and duty; but, when he himself began to feel the heavy hand of the oppressor, he was ready to acknowledge that such of his countrymen as had resisted British misrule were fully justified, and were engaged in a cause for imitation. In short, he determined to change sides at the first opportunity. Tarleton soon broke in upon the whispered conversation between the father and daughter, by ordering Carville and his guard to ride on ahead, as before.

The animal on which Letitia rode could not keep pace with the thorough-bred steeds of the troopers. By degrees she found herself separated further and further from the main body, until, to her unspeakable dismay, she was left alone with the man whom, of all on earth, she most abhorred and dreaded. During the evening, Colonel Tarleton had frequently applied himself to a leathern flask which hung at his saddle-bow, and, as the progress of intoxication advanced, his discourse became more and more offensive. He now declared his base designs in the grossest terms. Letitia, in the horror of the moment, could scarcely maintain strength enough to keep upon her saddle. At that instant, she heard a blow, which was quickly repeated, and immediately before her appeared Colonel Tarleton's horse, without his rider, running at full speed. She turned in amazement, and beheld, in precisely the same place which the horse had lately occupied, a very different figure—in fact, no other than the small, thin man in gray, whose meeting with young Richardson was described at the beginning of our history.

Seeing, or supposing, that Letitia was about to utter some ejaculation, the stranger said in a very low tone:

"Hush! You shall soon be in safety."

"Thanks, sir," said Letitia, "but my father is a prisoner in the hands of the rebels."

"Yes; I saw him ride past just now. We will do what we can; but do you remain where you are."

So saying, he set his horse in motion, and glided past her into the darkness, while Letitia remained under the shades of a lofty pine, listening. In another moment, she heard, on ahead, the report of muskets, shouts of hostility and of dismay, and all the noises of a desperate conflict. Presently the tumult seemed to come nearer, and she could see the red flashes which accompanied the discharge of the fire-arms. Then the hands together, Letitia prayed most fervently, though not loudly, for the blessing of heaven upon the righteous deed. The struggle was spread, and, from the nature of the triumphant shouts which Letitia then heard, she learned that the Americans were the victors.

In a few minutes more, her father was beside her, and with him came Alfred Richardson, who had borne a gallant and conspicuous part in the struggle which had just ended. There are few young people, we presume, whose imaginations will not inform them of the nature of the meeting between Letitia and her father, and the joy of the occasion was not a little enhanced by Mr. Carville's declaration to young Richardson that, by that day's proceedings, he had been completely cured of his Toryism. General Marion, who now came up, remarked to Alfred:

"I see, sir, you have a very young friend, that you are destined to render many important services to your country; and it appears that, even at this moment, your patriotism is not to go unrewarded. You perceive that your betrothed and her father now think more highly of you than if you had not engaged in the present affair, and that you have an opportunity to sacrifice their good opinion, in order to fulfill a patriot's duty."

That night Letitia and her father rested beneath the hospitable roof of Mr. Hollister, but hearts relieved of all apprehensions of treachery or violence. Alfred paced near them as a sentinel, and, when the morning arrived, a strong guard over the safety of her who was to him the most peerless treasure upon earth. Next morning the general early complied with young Richardson's request that the whole party should escort Letitia and Mr. Carville back to his father's house, and they accordingly turned their course in that direction, and rode by the side of Letitia, and occupied the time in a conversation so interesting to its participants that, had the distance been twice as far, it would have appeared to be too short.

"The sole cause that I now have to be dissatisfied with my fortune," said the young man, "is the absence of Letitia. But by my patriotism and especially my father, towards my course in joining the patriot army."

"You may be sure of seeing that cloud pass away also," replied Letitia, "for I think that the arguments of my father—who was recently as great a supporter of the royal cause as yourself—of any one could possibly be—will go a great way towards destroying Mr. Richardson's prejudices."

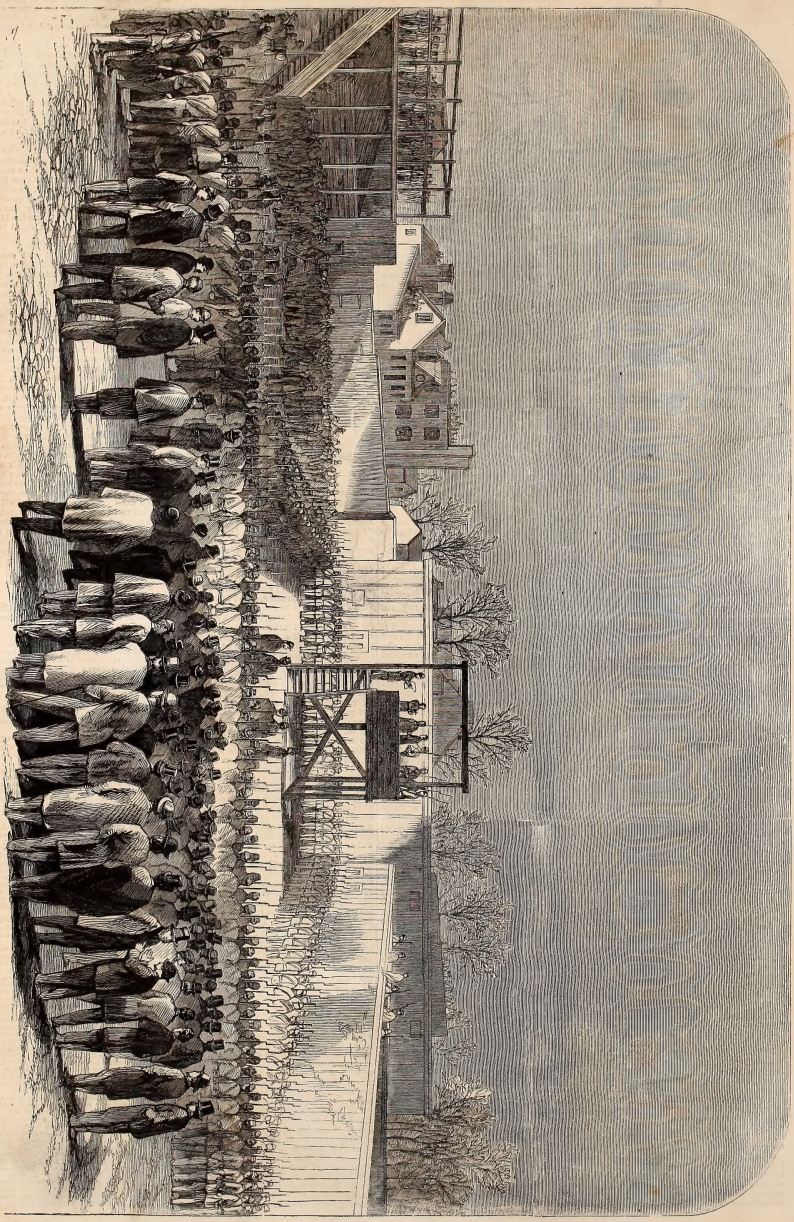
"I sincerely trust it may prove so," answered Alfred. But we are now in sight of my father's house. In case any roving party of British should have stopped there, or that the intention of our coming should be misunderstood, you and your father, dear Letitia, had better remain in the rear of my party. I must go and speak with General Marion."

With these words, he galloped to the front, and, placing himself by the side of Marion, said, "I know, general, that my father's unfortunate political principles have rendered him very obnoxious to the patriots, and it is probable that our approach will cause a good deal of alarm in the family. Shall I not precede you to the house, and inform my father, in your name, that neither his person nor property will be in the slightest danger from my comrades?"

The general assented, and Alfred accordingly started on his mission of filial duty. Old Richardson, mindful of his conversation with Tarleton, during the preceding day, had risen from his wakeful pillow, when he heard the tramp of horses across a little bridge not far from the house, immediately to hurried to a window, and, looking out, exclaimed to Mrs. Richardson, "Here comes a party of the rebels, by gracious! And Marion's one among, too, I dare be sworn, by their appearance!"

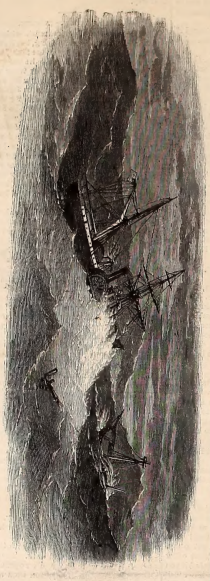
He then roared for Pompey to bring up an old musket, which, in consideration of such occasions, he always kept well loaded with slugs and buckshot, and, as he took aim with it from between the bowed shutters of a window, he constantly observed, "Colonel Tarleton cannot question my loyalty when I show him the dead carcasses of a dozen or so of rebels, shot by my hand! This fellow that comes galloping on ahead is their leader, I suppose; here's at him, in King George's name!"

The report of the musket still resounded through the air, when Alfred Richardson fell from his horse, and the green turf on which the boy crew crimson with the blood that flowed from his breast. In a moment General Marion and the agonized parents were kneeling upon either side of Alfred, Letitia supporting his head. Here his comrades gathered around with faces of deep concern. A feeble pressure of her hand, and a look of intense tenderness, was all the assurance which the unfortunate youth could now convey to his betrothed, of a love "strong in death." Letitia, still retaining upon her bosom, lying over him the flag beneath which he had fought, and, with a last exertion of his strength, to look down upon the embroidered star, pressed it to his lips, while his heaven-ward gaze silently invoked a blessing upon that flag and the cause which it represented. His eyes then grew dim, and he sank into that long slumber from which not even Letitia's voice, as she now called wildly upon his name, had a power to waken him.



Old Richardson had just re-loaded his musket, when one of his servants, who had been working in the field, came near enough to Alfred to recognize him, came rushing in to inform his master of the terrible effect of his first shot. The old man's mistaken zeal was not enough to sustain him beneath such a shock, and his mental faculties never recovered from its effects. He lived for several years afterwards, but in a state of melancholy stupor, bordering upon idiocy. Those who wished him best could not lament when he was released from so miserable an existence.

CHILDREN'S EATING.



THIS is a subject of literally vital interest to every family in the land, more especially in large towns and cities, where the want of facilities and inducement to outdoor activity renders it absolutely indispensable to adopt some system in reference to the times, quantities, and qualities of the food to be taken by children, to the want of attention to which things, multitudes die early, while other multitudes, not as large, however—for half of all that are born die before the age of eighteen years, in consequence mainly of inattention to the habits and health—become dyspeptic, scrofulous, or consumptive before the age of twenty-five, many of whom are destined to a life of weariness, of painful toil, and of wasting effort and suffering through sickness, and disease, and chronic sufferings.

On entering the fifth year, or sixth at farthest, a child has to be early habituated to eat at the table. Before a day, at intervals of five or six hours, with nothing whatever between, each child is to eat a little—a single good ripe apple, or a piece of cold, dry, coarse bread may be allowed in the forenoon, and the same thing, at two or three hours' interval, especially in connection with a bowl of bread-and-milk, most of the ailments of children into a life-long dyspepsia, simply because the stomach being kept at work all the time, has no time to rest its tone and strength, like an overworked servant or animal, and is rendered incapable of

A second consideration is quantity. If children are taught to eat slowly, in loving good nature—as will be the case if they are let alone by the mother—and not put in an ill-manner by incessant reprimands and inannoyed, they will soon find fortunately, that these two things which children most love everywhere, and of which they never have enough, are the best—the one when hungry, are milk and bread, and these furnish as much as they want, and which, by the same law that makes grow up healthy and handsome without good teeth, and as fine complexions as ever were seen, about the fourth year, their food should contain in great abundance those elements which are needful to make good, substantial teeth. The bony part of the tooth contains seventy-five per cent of lime, the enamel ninety-seven per cent. Out of one hundred parts of fine finest, whitest flour, only six per cent is lime; out of one hundred parts of meal made of the whole grain, there is twenty-five per cent of lime, or four times as much as in flour. The choice article of food contains anything like as much lime as common brown bread. Children like the nicest and beautiful teeth. When children are from home, let them live as others; when at home their bread should be uniformly made of the whole product of the grain ground, from their third to their fifteenth year, to be eaten with half a pint of milk for breakfast and supper, adding some berries from June until September, and one or two baked apples the remainder of the year, adding a teaspoon or two of sugar. Such a supper or breakfast will always "taste good" to them. Such a bill of fare, with two or three variations a week, and allowing them to eat what they want for dinner, will produce a purely vital blood, give rise to vigor, health, good teeth, a good constitution, and a good old age.

STORMS AT SEA.

AGNES IN THE MOUNTAIN.

"Have you seen her since the morning? Ah! the sun rose red and lowering,
But the storm clouds gathered thickly, and the sky grew ashen gray,
And she wandered off at dawning, seeking flowers upon the mountain;
Now the night is falling darkly, yet she lingers on her way.

"She was ever wild and giddy, roaming off, we knew not whither,
Till our hearts grew sick with terror, but she never stayed so long;
When the vesper bell was pealing, we would see her home returning,
Pausing at the valley chapel, there to sing her vesper song.

"Have you seen her? We have sought her, but in vain, throughout the valley,
Now the night is falling darkly, and the sky looks fierce and wild.
Hear the wind's low fitful moaning, and the mutter of the thunder;
If she be upon the mountain, Heaven guard our helpless child!"

Darker fell the night, and drearer, fiercer grew the storm and wilder,
While they sought the missing maiden, but their search was all in vain,
For the lightning mocked their torches, and the loud winds drowned their calling,
And their eyes were hurt and blinded by the sharply falling rain.

So the hours passed on in terror, till the storm had spent its fury,
And the first gray light of morning shone in promise of the day,
Then the sun uprose in splendor, filled the valley with its radiance,
And upon the purple summits like a golden glory lay.

Then again they climbed the mountain, searched each ledge, and cleft, and hollow,
"Pretty Agnes! gentle Agnes! she has perished in the storm,"
So they spoke her name in whispers, with a reverent, tender softness,
Fearing in each rocky fissure there to find her lifeless form.

But a shout rose loud and thrilling, "Hasten, comrades! we have found her!"
And they paused before a cavern lined with moss and lichens gray;
From the cruel storm, protected, sleeping sweetly as an infant,
Smiling softly as she slumbered there, the little maiden lay.

Strong and tender arms upraised her, bore her gently down the mountain,
Laid her, still in quiet slumber, on her mother's waiting breast.
Then the dark eyes opened slowly, with a steadfast, childish wonder;
"Are they gone, the lovely spirits who were with me in my rest?"

Thus the peasants tell the story, how the little maiden, Agnes,
Lay unhurt upon the mountain all that night, so bleak and wild;
And they say the Virgin Mother, looking on a mother's sorrow,
Sent her angels down from Heaven to protect the helpless child.

CHAPTER XXXIV.—AN AWKWARD QUESTION.

"Didn't yer call me?" again demanded Bob, as he still held the unfortunate Sleuth by the throat.

"Mercy!—mer——"

"'Bob!'—warn't that your cry behind my back?"

Sleuth was growing black in the face, and absolutely unable even to reply by a single word to the questions put.

He glared up in his conqueror's eyes, and the conqueror glared down in his eyes; their hot breaths mingling—their very veins, as it were, swelling and throbbing furiously against each other wherever they touched.

And then, when Sleuth thought his last moment had come, and he was growing faint and tasting the full bitterness of death, the savage grasp at his throat relaxed, without, however, letting go; and then, as he drew once more a live-giving breath, Bob laughed a loud laugh.

"Come, Mister Sleuth, second thoughts, they say, are best. I got a second thought; shall I tell you what it is?"

Seeing Sleuth too much exhausted to reply, Bob added:

"What shall I get by running my knife into your windpipe? Nothing. So sit up, Mister Sleuth, and be thankful that I ax you another question, and that you've got breath encugh in your body to answer it. Have you now had enow of your pretty little games?"

"Yes, yes. It was wrong; it—'

"Wrong!"

"I confess it was a shabby—"

"Rascally, say rascally!" and Bob, with a kind of glee, pricked Sleuth's thigh with the point of his knife.

"You hurt me, Bob," suddenly exclaimed Sleuth.

"Couldn't do it, 'taint in me. But say, rascally, Mister Sleuth;" and again Bob's knife was approaching.

"Rascally," burst from the startled Sleuth, as if thrown from him by a jet of unintended but irresistible force.

"You say it was a rascally trick to play your best friend?"

"I do."

"All right; I quite agree, Mister Sleuth. And now for the last thing as I has got to say to you and your lying and murdering carcass. You spooney, to think I come here to sich an appintment and carry the dockement about with me! I know all your little game now. That codicil was in my pocket, o' course, all ready for the handlin' of your murderous fingers. You'd only to trip me up with a bullet, and there I was, taken in, and lovelily done for. Don't you go for to make any more sich mistakes, Mr. Sleuth. I left it with my friend—the friend as fit me up with things to sell, and paid my expenses, and sent me hoff to make your fortin', you smooth-faced, white-washed beauty. Catch me a trustin' to you, and the likes of you. That ere codicil will be my ghost, and walk arter I'm dead and gone, if you do come down on me unawares. But folks say you're a dab at this ere game."

And then, stooping down, with a face that suggested to the startled Sleuth vague ideas of what might be coming, he whispered, in hoarse tones, that seemed to reverberate through the air, as if instinctively seeking to catch all ears, "Who killed the alderman, Mister Sleuth?"

How shall we describe the face, the look, the internal agitation, the outward pallor of Richard Sleuth, as he listened to Bob's question, and leaped, in thought, to the conclusion that the burglars knew what he had done, and that it was they who had informed Bob. For one single instant he was so paralyzed that he could not even guard himself by inventing an excuse to turn away his face; so that Bob was able to see and to appreciate the full force of his blow.

He did not spare Sleuth's feelings. On the contrary, he intensified them by his persistent look of sly, devilish knowingness; and Sleuth for a brief space felt all was lost—that he was in this man's power, and that henceforward his life would no longer be in his own hands, but in Bob's.

But this first terrible prostration of soul soon passed away; and though to him it seemed to have endured for a time so long in the suffering it brought that he was literally unable to measure it, his native cunning came to his aid, and whispered to him he had now no choice but boldness. And Richard Sleuth became bold, even while the first words dropped falteringly from his tongue.

"Will you repeat your question, Bob?" he said, with as much calmness as he could.

"No call for that, I should think. Leastwise, if I'd shot the old man, I shouldn't ha' wanted to be twice axed who did it!"

"Did I look surprised, Bob?"

"Rayther, Mr. Sleuth."

"I'm sorry for it."

"Shouldn't wonder," asserted Bob.

"I would rather you had asked any other conceivable question than that!" said Sleuth.

"I shouldn't wonder," again said Bob, but with a certain savage emphasis.

"And you think, Bob, you know why?"

"No I don't."

"No?"

"No; you're out there, Mister Sleuth; I don't think I know—I'm sure I know!"

Sleuth heaved a deep sigh, curved up his hands from the wrist just where they happened to be (before his heart), raised his eyes to heaven, and murmured:

"Poor Anthony! I'm sorry for you, even if you are guilty!"

"Dodgin' agin, Mister Sleuth!" asked Bob.

"Bob, I didn't think to have to speak to any human being as long as I lived on this subject, and I'd have given half my fortune, whenever it came into my hands, rather than I should have to speak of it; but you surprised me out of the truth, and now I must tell you what is the truth, so that you may make no horrible mistakes as regards me. Did you learn that the housekeeper saw a man in a white coat, just after the murder, going to a room where my uncle kept a safe with all his valuables?"

"Yes, I larned that."

"And did you learn that I had no such coat in my possession?"

"I was telled that, too, but I warn't obliged to believe it; eh, Mister Sleuth?"

"Stop a bit, Bob; you and I'll be of one mind presently. Did you learn that just such a light coat was worn by my cousin Anthony that very night?"

"No, I didn't hear that."

"Ask, then—ask anybody—ask Anthony himself, if you like, for the fact can't be denied; and when you have satisfied yourself about that, you'll know why I was so staggered. And then, I might tell you——. But spare me, Bob; it's a painful subject. He is my cousin, and after all, your friends, the burglars, may have themselves done the deed, almost without knowing it, in the hurry and confusion."

Such was Sleuth's method of parrying the deadly attack thus unexpectedly made upon him. But he was too cunning not to know that he must fortify what he had said, particularly after his own attempt on Bob, by very liberal dealing; so when Bob shook his head, and was evidently refusing to credit Sleuth's explanation, the latter plunged once more into the negotiations, and before five minutes the whole business was satisfactorily settled. Bob was to meet Sleuth next day in the same place, and then two documents were to be exchanged. The one was to be an undertaking to pay ten thousand pounds to Messrs. Slide and Sharple, in trust for Robert ——— (the name was left blank at Bob's request), commonly called Bob the Ostler, within one week after Richard Sleuth, Esq., should have come into undisputed possession of the property of the late Alderman Maude, through the codicil which the said Bob had been the means of saving from destruction. This was one of the documents to be exchanged. The other, we need hardly say, was the codicil, which was to transfer at a stroke everything Anthony possessed to his cousin, Richard Sleuth.

"And when is this 'ere codicil to be diskivered?" asked Bob, as he pondered over the fact that there might be a very inconvenient delay.

"Not a moment later, trust me, Bob, than I find safe. You must leave that to me. But now, as to your name. You had better put your right name into such a document as that—that is, if you want to have it legal."

Bob looked hard at Sleuth, then at his own dirty finger-nails, and then at his still dirtier boots, and seemed, just for a moment, to be thinking and doubting. But a villanous smile began to break out about his coarse lips, and illuminate with a sort of lurid light the rest of his face.

"You want my real name, Mr. Sleuth?"

"Not if you wish to conceal it, Bob."

"I ain't ashamed on it, Mr. Sleuth. Only I wish the old fellow was anigh us now, to hear what is that 'ere name. I should werry much like his sperrit to overhear me a saying to you, as I now say—Mister Sleuth, put into that 'ere dockement, a giving to me ten thousand pounds of the halderman's money—put into that dockement, I say, the name of Robert Stonor! You spells it beautifully, S-T-O-N-O-R!"

"Bob, is it possible! You the husband of the alderman's daughter?"

"I'm the blackguard you talked on, Mister Sleuth. But I ain't a thinking on you. You're but a poor creetur after all, Mister Sleuth. That's atween ourselves. Lord love yer! I wouldn't for the world say it to anybody else. Catch me! Don't I see his 'ighness is coming! Lord, how grand he looks! Squire Sleuth in his own ekipage! You won't mind condescending to let me lick your boots now, will yer?"

"Don't be a fool, Bob!"

"No; it ain't you I'm thinking on. But my old friend, the halderman—my father-in-law, Mister Sleuth. Don't I love his memory! But I've done him at last, Mister Sleuth; and I'd like to tell him so, even though he is dead. Don't the parsons say we live arter death! Then, he's sure to be hereabouts, looking arter this money."

Sleuth gazed round, awe-stricken. But Bob went on—

"He swore I should never have a sixpence of his money. Now, you tell him, Mister Sleuth, if he's anywhere a listening——"

"Bob! for heaven's sake——"

"I mean in the sperrit, of course, Mister Sleuth. Tell him, I say, you are going to give me ten thousand pounds; and, if anything can make him speak you'll hear him a shrieking at that! Ten thousand pounds! That's what you've got to pay. Tell him you're hobligated to do it. That other unpleasant thing'll have to be investigated if you don't do it, honor bright, and correct to time. Tell him that, Mister Sleuth, when next you meet the ghost."

"But, Bob—Mr. Stonor—you know, then, about the child—a boy, I suppose?"

"Boy? Yes; and a devil's limb of a boy he is, be you sure of that. I can make nothin' on him."

"And where is he now?"

"Open your eyes, Mister Sleuth, or else you'll be a runnin' agin him, and hurtin your nose. Haw! haw! haw! Good mornin', Mister Sleuth. To-morrow, at twelve. This 'ere same spot, where we made our other appointment. But mind, Mister Sleuth, no more little games when we meet."

"Trust me, Bob."

"Trust! hm! hm!" Bob looked at Sleuth, and roared again at the idea.

And so they parted; Sleuth feeling instinctively he had better try no more tricks upon Bob, but keep to the bargain they had made in good faith.

Soon after Stonor's back was turned, Sleuth heard wheels coming, and in a minute or two more he was grasping Anthony's hand, while Gibbs was unstrapping the portmanteau from the gig.

"Never mind me, old fellow," said Anthony, as his cousin gazed in his face with a look of anxious inquiry as to the cause of his gloom. "I'm out of sorts to-night, and besides, that Gibbs has given me a job I wasn't at all fit for."

"I couldn't but speak, sir," interrupted Gibbs. "I never thought as you'd lay into him there and then."

"Lay into who?—what?" asked Sleuth in astonishment.

"That little beggar of an Esau," said Anthony, "Gibbs has been growling about him all the week, every time I came near him. He came grumbling to-night when we were getting this turn-out ready for you."

"And 'nough to make one, sir," put in Gibbs, "to see the young limb asleep and snoring, and never a finger bin laid on the work I left him."

"And so you thrashed him?" asked Sleuth of Anthony.

"Yes; I was in no mood to stand it to night, so I thrashed him. It would have done me good if the little wretch had yelled; but, confound him! he was as quiet and still as a stone, and went off and laid down on some straw afterwards, and turned his face to the wall, in a way that made one's blood run cold. But we won't talk of that now. All the luggage right, Gibbs? And now, Dick, how are you. Anything particular turned up since you wrote?"

"No, nothing; but I'll tell you all about it."

"Not to-night, Dick—not to-night. I'm sick of this day; don't prolong it. Let's get home and put an end to it."

Sleuth, although he was by no means sick of the day and its results, remained silent, pondering over Stonor's suggestion, which seemed to point to Esau, and wondering whether he had better keep this knowledge to himself. And then Gibbs drove them homewards, at a rate that made the old wheels groan, while the little gig from the "Magnet" was left lying by the wayside in the moonlight, to stir the imagination and quicken the steps of travelers who might chance to pass that way.

CHAPTER XXXV.—KINSMEN.

The day Anthony had so much wished over passed away at last, but in dying, left its sadness and restlessness as a legacy to the night, through the long silent hours of which he thought and thought, by turns pitying and by turns reviling himself for what he suffered. Once he sat down at a writing desk—the same that in former days his uncle had habitually used, and for which, in consequence, Anthony had contracted a liking, in spite of its old-fashioned clumsiness, and re-read the letters from his cousins, and tried to realize the kind of life he had told Clarissa he should enter upon in India. To-night he could not get up the faintest enthusiasm for it. He disliked his mother's relations, who had never forgiven her for her marriage with his father the poor vicar; and he did not like them any better for having written directly they heard of his being the alderman's heir.

Anthony had one of the letters in his hand, and was bending dreamily over it, when he fancied he heard a slight noise at the door. He got up and listened near it, and, in the silence that followed, wondered whether he had been thinking of the stories Mrs. Milton used to tell them about the house being haunted by the ghosts of the British soldiers his uncle had helped to kill, and by the spirit of his poor cousin Nell, whom his uncle had never forgiven till her death. This last thought did not make Anthony smile as the first had done, but filled him with self reproach for having cared so little about the result of Sleuth's journey. He told himself that to-morrow he would hear his reports carefully, and if there should be the least clue to the finding of the child, he would himself set to work.

He was just turning away from the door, when he again heard the sound that had startled him, but this time quite distinctly. It was like a long breath or sigh, broken by a sharp sob.

Anthony opened the door. At first he saw nothing, which certainly made him a little nervous, being so sure of what he had heard. Then he heard the same thing again quite close to him, and, looking down, he saw something lying on the mat at his feet. He stepped back into his room rather quickly, took his candle from the table and brought it to the door, and there he saw, to his great astonishment, and certainly a little to his relief, Esau, doubled up on the mat and fast asleep.

"Poor little chap!" said Anthony, stooping down to look at him. "What on earth brought him here?"

His face was pale and streaked with tear stains, and his eyelids swollen and dark. The light falling on his face woke him, and he opened his eyes wonderingly upon Anthony, and then started up on his elbow.

"Why, Esau, Esau, whatever is this about?" asked Anthony.

Esau got up and stood rubbing his eyes.

"I think I fell asleep, sir," he stammered, in a broken voice.

"Yes, I saw that. But what did you come here for?" said Anthony. "Here, come inside and tell me."

He laid his hand on his shoulder, and drew him in and shut the door. Esau clung to the door-handle and turned his face away.

"Please sir, I'm sorry as I didn't do the work," he said, "I meant to do it all before they came home, but before I begun it I see him, and then I was obliged to keep out o' the way."

"Whom did you see?"

"Father."

"You saw your father?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, but you needn't be frightened; its evident he doesn't want you, and you're all right here aren't you?"

"I dunno, sir; I'm afeard you didn't like doing that, sir."

"What, thrashing you?"

"Yes, sir. I'm afeard as you'll send me away next time instead o' doing of it."

"Oh, nonsense! I hope the next time will never come. But I can tell you, Esau, you are right in that matter—I did not like it at all."

"I knowed that, sir; and that's why I wanted to come and say as—as——"

"As what?"

"As I was sorry you'd had to do it, sir; but I fell asleep while I was thinking of openin' the door."

"Well, now, be off to your bed and forget it."

"Please, sir, I'm locked in. I sleeps over the stables, sir. May I jest lay outside here till the mornin', sir?"

"No, no, no! Drag the mat inside, at all events. You shan't lay there like a dog."

The mat was drawn in, and laid at the foot of Anthony's bed, and Esau laid down upon it, and became as still as a mouse.

Anthony felt ashamed of reading letters and pacing up and down before the lad, so he also went to bed.

A long time after they had both been silent, Anthony said, gently:

"Asleep, Esau?"

And a voice answered:

"No, sir," in a tone that made Anthony smile, it was so full of perfect content and happiness.

"Good-night," said Anthony.

"Good night, sir," responded Esau, tremulously, as if in doubt as to whether he ought to answer at all.

Then they were both silent, and Anthony, in thinking how gently the wild young vagrant had borne his fit of passion, forgot his own troubles long enough to fall asleep; and in a few minutes the little kinsman at his feet—poor Nell's child—slept too—slept sweetly, as if unseen spirits blessed him.

CHAPTER XXVII.—MORNING SUNSHINE AND MORNING CLOUDS.

THE next morning Anthony was awakened by a consciousness of some one standing by his bedside, and, opening his eyes he found it was Esau. He was also conscious of a delicate sweet scent that reminded him of Clarissa's room. In answer to his look of sleepy wonder, Esau pointed to his master's hand, and glancing down at it, Anthony, with a sudden rush of wakeful blood to his heart, became aware that he held a tiny note.

"How did this come?" he asked, lifting his eyes, brilliant, and soft, and eager, to Esau's face.

"Joe Bunch brought it, sir.'

"Joe Branch!" Anthony repeated, as if the name were music to him. "Go, Esau; run along and tell Mrs. Mitten from me she is to make him stay breakfast with her."

When he was alone, Anthony looked at the note, turning it over and over, and holding it in both hands, as if he feared it might take wings and fly away from him, or vanish like the morning clouds of its own pale tint. Then he raised it to his lips and kissed it, and its perfume seemed to enter his very soul, and to caress it with answering tenderness.

He opened it at last, but the first glance at its contents brought a sudden hot blindness to his eyes. What could it be trying to him thus? Not Clarissa—it could not be Clarissa who wrote to him. "Dear Mr. Maude." He looked at the signature. Yes, it was hers.

Dear Mr. Maude (she wrote), what I said to you yesterday I hardly know. Your last words made me fancy my anger and the cause of it took everything. You said you could not forgive me for the words wrung from me in my outraged pride. Will it make any difference if I own to having passed a night of repentance for those words, whatever they might have been?

CLARISSA.

* * * * *

Sleuth had been waiting for breakfast one whole hour when Anthony entered the room.

"I was so glad you slept late," he exclaimed, advancing to meet him with outstretched hand and sympathizing look. "Why, Anthony, what's the matter? You look as if you were going to a wedding."

"Confound it!—yes, you're right, Dick—it would be absurd to wear these gloves. And this frill, too. It's rather late—but wouldn't you change it?"

"On no account—that is, I think not. But how should I know for what occasion?"

"Never mind that now, Dick. Let me tell you all about it when I come back. For the present, old fellow, give me your best wishes. You do, don't you, Dick?"

"Anthony, you know I do," said Sleuth, grasping his hand, and looking earnestly into his face, bright, flushed, almost handsome with happiness.

"Yes, I do know it; and Dick, your time will come before long; and mind, no secrets from me on that matter; for I shall be awfully particular about her, old fellow—the future mistress of the old place, you know. Why, Phillis, Phillis, what's the matter?"

She had just entered with the coffee, and hearing Anthony's last words to Sleuth, had become so confused, that she let the tray droop forwards, so that the heavy, old-fashioned vessel toppled over, and fell to the floor.

"I wish you'd look where you're going, Phillis," said Sleuth, sharply. "The carpet will be perfectly ruined."

"Deuce take the carpet!" exclaimed Anthony, "the poor girl's crying. Come, come, Phillis, there's no harm done in the world."

He spoke so kindly that Phillis burst out afresh.

"Godmother will be so angry with me!" she sobbed, as an excuse for her tears.

"Oh, tush, nonsense!" cried Anthony. "Make some excuse. Say that Mr. Sleuth knocked it over—that he wanted a kiss; or that I did, or anything you like. And here—here's something to buy a new apron with, for this that you've spoiled. There, now, don't fret any more. Good-bye, Dick!"

"Oh, Richard, Richard!" cried Phillis, when Anthony had gone, "What will he say—oh! what will he say when he knows?"

Sleuth did not consecond to answer her. He was watching the new cousin with a look of pain, and his face was full of envious curiosity and hatred.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—THE CASKET GIVES UP ITS TREASURE.

ANTHONY'S mare, Nell, was no more averse to breakfasting at Petterham than her master, and cleared the Eddington lanes at such speed, that each "clear road" widley before it could push off its night-cap of soft summer mist to see them, was left far behind. The lanes were certainly a little dusty, and a little hot; but this morning they disappeared so fast behind Nell's flying feet, and brought the dark belt of trees round Petterham so near, that Anthony was in no mood to complain of them.

Mr. Joseph Branch—who, by-the-bye, must have got up in an accommodating mood this morning—had left his little door in the wall ajar, and here Anthony dismounted, led the mare through, and left her to find her own way to the stables.

He looked down the little path by the fruit-wall, but saw there only a busy conclave of birds, arranging the division of a new-fallen peach, that lay blushing in the mignonette.

Then he went straight to the house—heard that the doctor was not yet up, but that Miss Pumpkess was in the breakfast room. He declined the servant's offer to announce him, and ran up, hardly feeling the stairs beneath his feet.

Another minute and he was close behind Clarissa's chair.

The poodles lying asleep on the doctor's crimson hearth-rug had not been disturbed by his entrance; the pouting-lipped Clarissa on the wall was smiling at him; but the Clarissa by whom he stood sat, leaning her cheek on her hand, looking out into the same garden, all unconscious of his presence. Her other hand was close to John Harris's casket, which stood open on a little table beside her. It stood open, and how could Anthony help looking into it? or how, when he saw it empty, could he keep his eyes from seeking for its contents, and finding them, at last, on Clarissa's lap? A few dead flowers only; but they still kept in their decay a form and character that Anthony could recognize instantly. Here was the jasmine wreath that he had got from the river-wall, though it was now all twisted out of shape, and had lost many a tiny flower before he knew it was. And the spray of dead heath that he had dropped in her room that morning, when he came downstairs to see her—the fair Clarissa "Heath—he knew that when he saw it, for he had passed many hours over its scented bells, each of which had shaken out for him its silent music, a most pleasant dream. But had those bells ever been as eloquent as now, when they lay crushed, and dry, and withered? There was the rose, too, which he had gathered at her request yesterday, at the beginning of the ride; a rose picked out from among the many in her room touched him more than all the rest. The feeling that came over him as he stood there—the feeling, half of deep joy and half of pain, that he last she might be very indignant and angry at having her secret surprised—reminded him of a little incident in his childhood. Many years ago, when his days he and his uncle had a frightful quarrel, and Alderman Maude had the satisfaction of hearing a little nephew and his hunted out of his house in a rent of baby rage from Anthony's lips. In his anger and dismay he struck the child, who flew at him, and set the nails of his teeth in his clenched hand. The hand was opened, and the rose fell from it. Anthony saw an exquisite little toy, which he knew had been intended for him. Even then, in the fifth year, his instinct in such like well enough to know the shame he would feel at his intended present being found out in the midst of his passion. He had struck the child in a fury in a passion of remorse, seized one of them round the ankle, and would not be shaken off, but let the alderman drag him to the door of the private den room. He even clung tighter when his uncle threatened to go down stairs, and at last the old man relented, and there was a reconciliation as passionate as the quarrel.

The feeling with which he now looked on these dead flowers, was much the same as that with which he had regarded the toy given to him in his uncle's great hand all those years ago. He had felt grieved for his uncle's shame at the discovery, and now he felt, in the full sense of the word, a pang of grief for the shame which he knew Clarissa would suffer when she should find him there. He longed with an unspeakable longing to steal away unnoticed himself before his uncle that day—to fall at her feet there in the sunshine, and refuse to rise till she had forgiven him.

It might have been that his hand on the back of her chair trembled at that minute, or it might have been that the eye of one of the white poodles, directed its gaze at the intruder, and caused Clarissa to look up, or it might have been merely a sudden instinct that made her do so. However it might be, look up she did, and met Anthony's eyes, full of trouble and delight. She became very pale, and rose slowly, letting the dead flowers waste on the floor. Then as Anthony looked at them and at her, he felt he had but weakly imagined what her shame and anger would be. He was not even firmly angry now, and her eyes, gazing straight into his, had the half-threatening, half-pleading look of the wild deer when it first sees day's light in the forest. And the evening brings it face to face with its pursuer. He felt that her eyes at once commanded him and entreated him to take her part, and that he proved he had surprised, and Anthony still had that passion, ate wish that he might make it seem to her he had not seen or guessed her secret. And as the cold flashing blue eyes grew more and more defiant and haughty, he became less tender over her shame, and more and more exultant over his own delight.

Putting his foot on the dead flowers, he took her hands, and made her sit down again, and then he knelt at her feet. Then he told her, and Clarissa knew that her hand trembled, and that her face, though haughty and erect still, was no longer pale; but her pride whispered to her that though she could no longer keep her secret, she might best punish him by her coldness for having surprised it, and so rejected all his movement speech yesterday in the woods, and asked herself how she could bear the humiliation of his knowing that she had all the while suspected he had dared to make had been true after all. She thought of this, and tried to call up to her lips the bitter chilling, cruel words that would hurt his pride, and put an end to his joy and triumph at once and for ever. While sentence after sentence presented itself, and was rejected for not being cold and bitter enough, she felt Anthony's arm slip from the back of her chair round her, and Anthony's cheek rest on hers. She turned and looked at him, feeling that this should give her inspiration to speak without her seeking any longer for words. But she looked in vain, and was so free from any triumph and joy—were so tender and wistful in their passionate, pleading gaze—that she became utterly confused. She gazed back into them helplessly, even though they came nearer and nearer to her; and then, when she saw tears rising into them, instead of her angry speech there came only tears on her own face, and a sweet, quivering smile on her lips.

Anthony knew, by those slowly-oozing tears, that her pride was bleeding to death in her eyes, and he made a darkness for it to die in by drawing the head to him, and keeping the tender lids shut with his lips.

The eyes rewarded him at last by looking up into his—not with a smile, or with tears, but with a gaze full of the sweet solemnity of perfect love. And it satisfied him, and he was very still—wondering, asking almost in prayer, whether such joy as his might live.

* * * * *

Neither could ever recall how long they had sat thus, before they were startled by the doctor's loud, amazed, and angry—

"Hem!"

And looking up, beheld him standing at the door, and accompanied by Mr. Robertson.

THE STORMS AT SEA.

THE latter part of the month of October will be memorable in the annals of the sea, as having produced a sense of the most terrible storms within the memory of the mariner. Our coast is strewed with wrecks, and the neighborhood of Florida and the West Indies Islands has been fairly swept.

We have embraced, as far as the pencil can give an idea of the terrors, to illustrate the destruction of one shipping.

The first upon the list is the ship Mercury, of Liverpool, which foundered off Cape Canaveral on Thursday, the 26th of October. On the 26th four of the crew were picked up—three by the U. S. steamer Newbern, and these are supposed to be all that are left from the passengers and crew.

We give a picture of the dreadful condition, having been in the water so long a time (four days). Their clothes are all worn off them, their legs very much swelled from the action of the salt water, and they had attempted to quench their thirst by sucking the blood of the sharks that in large numbers were around as a testimony to the fact. They were made as comfortable as possible on board, clothing, etc., being furnished them.

The next on the list is a steamer, name unknown, going on shore on the coast of Cayotteé Reef, and is almost as soon as she struck, commenced going to pieces. As the storm abated she was seen by the steamship Yew York, and the officers, surrounded by wreckers, which is equivalent to being in the hands of pirates, sail on with him.

The steamship Columbia, which sailed from New York on the 25th ult., was overtaken by the gale the day after her departure, and her arrival at Havana, on the 29th, encountered a succession of storms. On the third day out the steamship teased to and fro, and it seemed every moment as if she would be engulfed by the ocean. Three horses, out of four, which were on deck, were washed overboard. Shortly after, two more of the purser was very much damaged by water, and many of his papers were carried away. Many other things which were on deck at the time were exposed to the gale were swept overboard. The ship careened so, that the lamps of the cabins fell down and darkness prevailed, causing much consternation among the passengers, especially among the ladies. The captain and the officers behaved admirably during the time of need. It was once thought that both had been swept overboard by the wave.

The second engineer stood, with pistol in hand, to prevent the firemen from leaving their places when the steamship was in the most imminent danger.

The light-ship off Port Royal is entirely carried away, and all on board lost.

All up the coast, the storm was fearful, and the harbor strewn with wrecks, either made upon the spot or of those that had dragged their shattered remains to that place for safety.

The steamship Republic from New York to New Orleans, sailed on the 9th ult. Captain Hawthorne gives this account of the loss.

"Through Monday night, off the latitude of Havana, the wind increased, and the sea rose, when obliged to put head to the gale; blowing from E. N. E. To-day —Blowing a hurricane; machinery gave out; could not get the wheels to work; washed away boats, starks and paddle boxes. Wednesday morning—Still blowing; heavy sea; steamer also ordered to throw the between deck cargo overboard, which we commenced immediately, breaking out boxes and passing them up through the hatchways and gangways, the other aft; we now found that the donkey boiler had given out, and the ship was making water very fast. At one o'clock in the night ordered a raft to be built, which was done by taking three spars and lashing them to the steamer's bow, fastening them with double lashings; then put boards across each way, three thicknesses, and lanced it overboard. Boats were also prepared ready, and put in his, thirteen first mate, seventeen; second mate, twelve; third mate, twenty-four; two men were on the wreck, the balance on the raft. Her crew numbered forty-five, thirty passengers, two stowaways. At half-past four P. M. the boats were ordered to shove off, and as we observation for a couple of days, it was very uncertain where we were. According to the course steered by the ship round the coast we be eastward, as I log, from eight o'clock that night, before the sea and two the steamer's bow, and by much course, at the rate of three miles an hour, and left the Gulf at six P. M. on Tuesday, abreast of Edisto Inlet. At noon on Friday, 27th, sighted the village of Bluffton, South Carolina, one of the U. S. mail steamers plying between Port Royal and Savannah, and hailed us very kindly until we arrived at Port Royal. There was a report that all but the second mate's boat and the raft had been picked up, and two steamers were to be dispatched to look for them on Sunday night from Port Royal.

There are only a small portion of the terrors of the sea that occurred during this memorable week. Our correspondents in other years have passed since no heavy a drain has been made on their coffers, and the deep sea will attest the life and treasure that has gone to feed her ever-hungry maw. It is a story that in a great measure will be for ever untold.

THE CONSTANTINOPLE FIRE DEPARTMENT.

Just now, when the municipal offices of the world are making great reforms in their Fire Departments, it will be of interest to know how far off places are progressing to their efforts to extinguish conflagrations.

It is well known that the city of Constantinople has always been afflicted in a chronic way by fire. A conflagration of 1,000 houses is not an uncommon occurrence, and within one year four fires have occurred, the largest of which consumed 600 houses. Of course, under these circumstances, it is natural to inquire what means they have to check these fires. Very great enemy. The question is answered by saying that up to within a few months, that great city has depended on the bucket system that went out with your grandfathers, and at an alarm which, possibly, before a dozen buckets could be brought to bear, would have a hundred houses in a blaze, there were not more than a dozen two gallon buckets to quench it.

Now they have adopted a mode of extinguishment, the old French mode, which to our eyes looks little better than a pocket syringe. The method which they have taken up from the French, is just about to be, or is just, discarded by the city of Paris in favor of the English method. It is quite a lucid engine carried upon the shoulders of men, and is entirely dependent upon the promiscuous crowd to operate it.

In case of fire, the soldier or policeman announces it by crying, as with us in the olden time. At this the engines are seized by their able-bodied men who appear, and are hurried to the fire. They have certain regular stations, but these are seldom on hand when wanted, and in case of one fire some of them are being the supreme purpose, who act as handlers of axes, or as communicators of indirect.

We suppose that the day is rapidly coming when American engines will find their way to Constantinople, as they inspired in Germany and Paris, and show the Turks that fires are an unnecessary luxury.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THE young woman who fainted away has been sold by her friends that it would be more delicate for her to faint at home.

UPON WHAT "LINE" HAVE THE GREATEST NUMBER OF ACCIDENTS HAPPENED?—Upon the C.R.I.N.O. line.

"Oh, you fool!" exclaimed Smith, "you made my head ache."

"That's nigh it's hollow," said Brown.

"Didn't your's ring?" said Smith.

"No," said Brown.

"That's a sign it's cracked," replied his friend.

THE Rev. Dr. Gilfillan was, one winter night, called upon by a parishioner, who said to him: "I doubt you're solved to enjoy some light conversation with the Scotch Divine."

"Troy, doctor, can you tell me why that is called the dog-star?" said the latter, endeavoring to change the current of that luminary.

"Because it is a sky-terrier, I suppose," was the witty reply.

A MAN in this city, who had never expressed a word in favor of the election of "Blue Nose," a Nova Scotia girl. Some time after, a Nova Scotia acquaintance of his called upon him, and said to him:

"I suppose you have changed your mind, now that you have a Nova Scotia wife?"

"Not by a darned sight!" was the reply of the husband, with the emphasis on the word not, "I only married her because I was in a hurry."

Not long since a fire-eating Irishman challenged a barrister, who gratified him by an acceptance. Pistols were chosen, and the combatants met at the appointed place.

"Now, sir," said he, "I have a right to all the advantage I can get, and I insist upon your standing with your back to the sun."

"With pleasure," replied the lawyer, "on condition that I may have the shade."

The joke settled the quarrel.

THE sieve through which the man strained every curse, is called a pocket handkerchief.

"SMALL thanks to you," said a plaintiff to one of his witnesses, "for what you said in this case." "Ah, sir," replied the conscious witness, "but just think of what I didn't say."

A HARD CASH.—To be shipwrecked, and cast upon an uninhabited island without a shilling in your pocket.

THE gentleman who borrowed an oyster knife to open an account of his business with, is anxious to meet with a patient cookseeow to draw a cheque.

"WHAT is that, Mr. Cowley, that I saw animal dropped from the clouds?" "The rain deer," was the whispered reply.

A SCHOOL-BOY ago an amusing incident took place in one of the most splendid of the New York hotels. A southern gentleman was a boarder in the house, but not wishing to take his meals at the table d'hôte, had them served in his own room, with all the elegance for which the establishment is noted. Being somewhat annoyed with the size of the sugar-scrawl who waited on him, he desired him, one day at dinner, to retire. The negro lowed, and took his stand directly behind the gentleman's chair. Supposing him gone, it was with some surprise that, a few minutes after, the gentleman saw him step forward to remove the soup.

"Stop him," said he, "leave the room, I wish to be alone."

"Scuse me, sare," said Cuffee, drawing himself up stiffly, "but I am responsible for de silver."

A MODERN BOAR HUNT IN BAVARIA.

MATTERS of the chase are come to rather tame pass in our day. Daring has given place to dodging in this as in so many other things, and the cunning of the arm with the spear has become supplanted by the cunning of the eye with the rifle.

Thanks to the genius of a Snyders, we can more than imagine the boar hunt of former times, otherwise the powers of fancy might have stretched in vain from our present mode of giving such a brute the quietus to that period when, in his gnashing fury, a course was rent through bending assailants, or a breathing-space secured by strewing the ground with their mangled bodies.

Let us start, then, at Aschaffenberg—the Fontainebleau of his Bavarian majesty—and even speak of the warning injunctions our Frankfort host gave about the great forest that lay in our way.

On we went, and at last—Oh, welcome sound!—the barking of a dog proclaimed man's dwelling-place, and then the glimmering of a light created quite a glow of satisfaction within me. It was the half-way inn for which I had been told, and for which I had been looking out most longingly. After stamping the snow from my feet, I entered as joyously as ever benighted traveler did in this world, though to my surprise I found the Stube fully occupied by a set of fierce Jägers, smoking, drinking and playing cards.

A little largesse from my tobacco beutel won me the cordial fraternity of those heroes, and on my intimating a desire to see something of the morrow's proceedings, it was met in a right spirit, and, although none of the good family were about to assist in the piece, I learned that the grand forest-master, or Jagt Junker, with certain dons of state were to be present. It was, moreover, to be a boar hunt, and the game being already marked down, I was given to understand that it would be a regular big battue, and that at least a score of the bristly race would crown the day's work. Here, then, was something irresistible, and I dare say my ears waxed larger, and perhaps longer, under all this; but certain misgivings were not to be staved off, and, on my touching upon the question of risk to be incurred, one of the party began to reassure me after this fashion:

"The great point, mein Herr, in hog sport, is presence of mind. Keep fast by that, and when a hog makes towards you, keep upright—that is, stand firm on your legs; for if you lose presence of mind down you go, in your knee, like a drowning man, and he instantly rips you up, whilst by standing stoutly on end he can only by your legs spear."

"Lay the legs open, did you say?" was my prompt query, not exactly comprehending—or, rather, being strangely puzzled by—this form of instruction.

"Ja wohl," said my instructor, suppressing an evident inclination to smile; "with a bit of a jerk right out, and gets it too near home to require anything farther. So keep in rear of one of us, mein Herr, and devil a scratch will you get."

To this the senior of the party nodded full assent, and I went to bed fully determined to profit by this opportunity of seeing, for the first time in my life, a boar hunt.

My dreams were rather disturbed by a panic-magoris in which, of course, the life de sanglier figured very conspicuously. All I had ever seen of boar hunts on canvas, with disemboweled dogs for accessories, became also displayed in such a striking light before my sealed eyes, that I need hardly say I was soon in a far worse predicament than even poor Actæon himself, for boars, as well as dogs, had me down. But realities often step in to deliver us when too much oppressed with the ideal world, and I awoke under the maltreatment of the pack to find one of the friendly Jägers shaking me, with a gentle reminder that if I "really was for the sport," I had better get up, as they would all be off shortly to meet the forest-master.

I found the party reinforced, and some large hounds made their appearance in coupling-chains, whilst Schnapps was going the round, and, the better to enlist the stalwart band in defence of their neophyte, I directed an additional round to be served out on my account.

Many roguish, rough-looking attendants were also lounging about and sipping the early dram; for, though not of a very gentle order themselves, these Jägers formed a class of superiors, as the doffed hat and abashed look of these their serving men plainly told. The dress of this Jäger corps, though varying in some instances, was of dark gray, faced with green, tunic form, and caught in at the waist with a girdle, from which hung the trenchant couteau de chasse. Most of them wore small felt hats of dark green, fitting closely, and with a tuft of black feathers in the band. Some had whistles made of the boar's tusk, and I observed one with a boar's sconce in brass on his shoulders, from which distinction I set him down as a sort of head keeper or lieutenant of the corps. But what struck me most in this really fine body of rangers was the enormous moustache nearly every one exhibited.

I have seen some stiff beards in my day, but I think I never met with such a display of the cuncta supercilio as I did among these Bavarians, for, without exaggeration, the poorest of the lot would have furnished material enough for a good-sized hearth-brush.

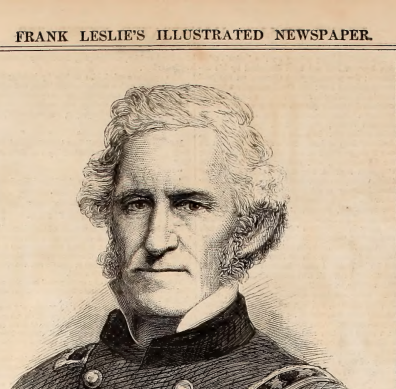
The chief Nimrod made his appearance at a point about an hour's walk off, where there was a large ring of leafy beeches, with such a gateway as no doubt led to some woodland château. His party mustered about half-a-dozen, and though I could see they were all men of rank, there was nothing in their equipment that denoted style or superiority.

There was a score of good rifles at least, besides a respectable contingent of muskets, and as nearly all carried the couteau de chasse as well, I thought the turnout must have little in it, or the boar be, of a truth, a very curious customer, if we poor defenceless devils of the outer squad came to grief.

After a short chat, and a cursory survey of arms and appliances, the force broke up into detachments, and certain instructions were given to each petty leader as they moved off one after the other for their respective beats, or, as I concluded, to form so many segments in the great starting circle. Each party also took off its contingent of followers, and, my eye being on my old friend, he beckoned me as his own particular recruit, and I fell in and followed a portion of his company.

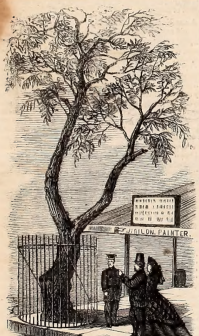
I began, however, to review the matter in my own mind de novemo; and, certes, the chance of an awkward rip did not appear quite so remote, under this detailed order of movement, as if it had been en gros.

But I was now in for it, and, "being in," you know what Shakespeare says about getting out, though, as guidance for others, I would just here recommend a traveler to keep his onward path, and not volunteer into strange service, or get into positions which may lead either to danger or difficulty.



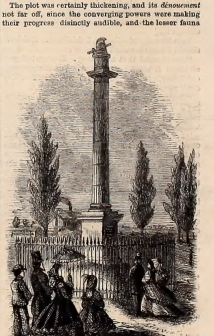
The mast and dead leaves became drifted into such dells and hollows as the ground offered, and, with a crisp covering of snow, we very soon found ourselves ploughing our own path knee-deep, and with a gentle intimation from our leaders that the animals with whom our business lay might turn up at any moment.

Indeed, my own especial corporal gave me a nod to this effect, and was just adding, "Now we hit on something," when a sonorous "Guff!" that would have startled the seven sleepers broke on my ear, and beneath a kick-up of leaves and snow I beheld a mound and bristly mane cutting along at a furious rate in the foreground. "Bang!" went my old friend's rifle. "Guff! guff!" A bang left and another right were followed by a loud "Guffee!" and in the next minute one of the Jägers was drawing the dead animal our way, with a short bit of stick passed through the snout, and a trail of blood in the rear. It was a sow of about two years old, with but little of the formidable, and not much of anything else that I could see save bristles and a loose, flabby carcase—hideous, however, withal—and such a strange disproportion of head, and so malignant the grin even in death, that it hardly looked like any earthly creature.



They are of a dingy iron-gray, these wild swine, inclining to rust color about the belly and the inner side of the legs, but there is a prickling up of the bristles of the snout caused by the tusks which gives them a most diabolical expression of ferocity, and their coating stands out sharp as wire, and shows shaggy as they lie upon the snow.

We now heard the rifles cracking away in more than one direction, so that the forest forces were beginning to concentrate; and from a little variation in the "guff" notes the grunters were evidently becoming alive to their position, and whatever the other parties to these presents might feel, I, on my own part and behalf, began to entertain certain feelings of anxiety about the probable upshot of these boarish battle-notes when the full herd got into grand chorus, and were driven to a last desperate stand. Nor was my concern any less for the assurance my old chaperon gave at this crisis, that we had got two or three first-rate boars in the circle, and might look forward to a smart battue, or what he called "a pretty piece of pastime."



The plot was certainly thickening, and its dénouement not far off, since the converging powers were making their progress distinctly audible, and the lesser fauna and left of his tusks," exemplifying the reader aperauti by a very significant action of his own parded sconce, "he'll just lay one leg after the other open—perhaps only one—but so cleanly and smartly that all beside in a very short time."

"Ha! some consolation certainly," I said, half-lamenting what I perceived was at the bottom a sort of joke; "but with no mind to subject my legs to the healing powers, I would rather avoid his lesser evil, and keep my presence o' mind to divert mischief which does not come exactly of my own seeking."

"Schon gut (good), mein Herr," said a general laugh, "and the chances are that you will come to no mischief at all, yet it is better to understand the case in its bearings; and what I say is to meet that one chance of the boar's breaking the ring and coming bolt at you; for if you suffer yourself to be knocked over for want of his presence of mind, with one stroke of his tusk there is an end of you."

"A pure joke, eh?" broke in another, rising from his seat, and taking the middle of the floor. "Look at this little skewer," displaying a couteau de chasse with a good foot of double-edged blade. "He must clear a ring of these after the round of rifles; and, mind you, we don't give him much way between us; but just offer him the point of this to pick his teeth with, and nine times out of ten he dashes began to squib about in our front as though the ends of the earth were coming together. We had had above an hour of steady advance on our side, and though it might be difficult to determine the extent of area upon which the different sections radiated, I judged the focus they now came to at about a mile in circumference. It was pretty clear of trees, and from there being a made-up patch of cover, like a bed of reeds and withered fern, full in the centre, I required no intimation as to why we now halted or where the grand performance was about to take place. Indeed, there came enough of tuning and pitching pipes from that piece of middle screenwork to afford all the intimation that was requisite, and the position of the enemy's orchestra settled, I looked out for our own first fiddlers, the forest-master and chiefs of our dramatis personæ.

There appeared also a blank in the circle, one segment short of the round, but I could hear its approach; and from a show of activity in that quarter, the leading actors were doubtless about to make their début there. And so it proved, and so the ring became complete, the entire file presenting about fifty men armed, who took up ground at about the same number of paces from each other, whilst attendants, followers, and a few straggling fools like myself might count a hundred. These showed front in the rear, and between the intervals, though, for my part, I made up my mind to show no front at all if it came to anything serious, since, with my equipment, I might as well maintain front before Sebastopol with a bulrush in my hand. Most of the other secondaries bore some sort of weapon, and one near me held an axe over his shoulder, yet was evidently a woodman

THE FIRE DEPARTMENT OF CONSTANTINOPLE—RUNNING TO THE FIRE.

MAJOR-GEN. LORENZO THOMAS,

Adjutant-Gen. of the United States.

ONE of the greatest errors into which civilians fall, is the belief that greatness in a general is only to be achieved in the field.

It was one of the strongest axioms of Napoleon, that he could find fighting officers everywhere, but executive ones nowhere. In other words, that bravery was the rule, not the exception, and that it only required a brave man for a fighting officer, while it required the highest of executive and business qualities to make one that could put armies in the field and organize them.

We do not promise this as applying especially to the case of Major-General Lorenzo Thomas, the exception being, that this able soldier, having reached the highest position of his department from the lowest commissioned rank, is indebted for several of his steps to distinguished gallantry in the field.

Gen. Thomas was born in the town of New Castle, State of Delaware, on the 26th of Oct., 1804. His father, Evan Thomas, though born in the same State, was of Welsh extraction, while his mother, Elizabeth Sberer, was of English blood, her ancestors having come to this country in the middle of the 17th century. She was related to the Randolphs, and through her veins flowed some of the famed blood of Pocahontas.

Lorenzo Thomas entered the Military Academy at West Point, Sept. 1st, 1819; graduated July 1st, 1823, and was appointed Second Lieutenant in the 4th Infantry, with that date; First Lieutenant, March 17th, 1829; Captain, Sept. 30d, 1838; Major, Jan. 1st, 1846. The foregoing being regimental commissions, which latter was declined, from the fact that he already bore the same rank upon the general staff. On the 7th of July, 1838, he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Brevet-Major, and Lieutenant-Colonel by brevet, Sept. 20d, 1847, for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Monterey; Lieutenant-Colonel, July 15th, 1853, which brings him down to the opening of this rebellion.

It will be remembered, that at the opening of this rebellion, Samuel Cooper, a New Yorker, was Adjutant-General of the United States, with the rank of Colonel, that being at the time the highest rank held in that department. Cooper, a Northern born man, resigned, and went over to rebellion, while Lorenzo Thomas, Southern born, clung the closer to his flag and country, and found a part of his reward in an elevation to the vacancy, first in March 7th, 1861; as Brevet Brigadier-General, May 7th, and Brigadier-General, August 3d, of the same year, while, on the 13th of March, 1863, he was made Major-General by brevet, for gallant and meritorious services during the war with the rebellious States.

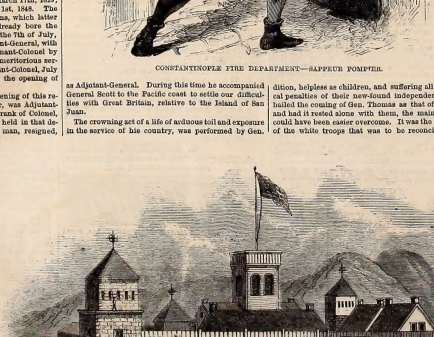
What those services were, would require a volume to recount. They are identified with the history of the country, and as time blows away the cloud of battle smoke that hangs over the great achievements of the war, the work of this great man will stand out in bold relief upon its pages.

Of his early service, it will only be necessary to say, that it was rendered in Florida, two years of the time as Adjutant of his regiment; in Georgia and Alabama, in the Creek and Seminole nations; also, in Louisiana and Mississippi, reaching up to the year 1833, when he was detailed in the Adjutant-General's office on the recommendation of Gen. Twiggs to Gen. Jones, who then filled that office, the young Lieutenant at that time showing his executive talent while recruiting for his regiment in Philadelphia.

In the years 1836-7, he took part in the war against the Seminole Indians, and established the important depot at Tampa Bay; also acted as chief of staff to Major-General Zachary Taylor, in his Indian campaign of 1839-40. In the war with Mexico, he acted as chief of staff to Major-General William O. Butler. When General Scott was relieved, General Butler took supreme command, still retaining his chief of staff, from which he was transferred to the same exalted position on the staff of General Winfield Scott, and so continued until the breaking out of the rebellion, and his appointment as Adjutant-General. During this time he accompanied General Scott to the Pacific coast to settle our difficulties with Great Britain, relative to the Island of San Juan.

The crowning act of a life of arduous toil and exposure in the service of his country, was performed by Gen. Thomas in the organization of 80,000 blacks into service for the troops, a labor of two and a half years, in the midst of difficulties that would have appalled any but the quiet, indefatigable worker who had the mission in hand.

He went to the Ohio and Mississippi to find the land swarming with the freedmen, of every age, sex and condition, helpless as children, and suffering all the physical penalties of their new-found independence. They hailed the coming of Gen. Thomas as that of a saviour, and had it rested alone with them, the main difficulty could have been easier overcome. It was the opposition of the white troops that was to be reconciled. Gen. Thomas held the power to enforce his acts, without appeal, but he chose rather to place the matter before the sound good sense of his countrymen in arms, and his judgment in doing so is shown by the universal success of his work, an end that never could have been accomplished by force. From Memphis to Corinth, 100 miles, he addressed the troops 15 times, taking the ground, positively, that the blacks must be received and protected, even though in doing so every white officer was dismissed and every private punished. That the blacks must be used for garrison purposes while the skilled and intelligent white must do the duty adapted to his intellect and called for by his country.



The eloquence and business skill of Gen. Thomas carried the day, and the result was the organization of 80,000 able-bodied negroes into regiments, an organization that turned the tide of war through all that section, and relieved the Government of one of its most difficult problems. He sent relief to thousands of starving women and children, and changed the entire condition of a people. It is gratifying to know that in this important mission Gen. Thomas had the unqualified assistance of Gen. Grant, and of Gen. Dodge, commanding in that Department.

The enthusiasm of the worker made him careless of his physical welfare, and the result was that almost with the conclusion of his labor he was stricken with sickness and borne home where for a long time he hovered between life and death, but was happily spared to see the results of his labor. The name of him who as Adjutant-General of the great armies of the United States, through a long and exhausting war, may not be daily blazed through all the press, but his sacrifices and labors will make a page in history of which the greatest may well be proud.

In person Gen. Thomas is tall and erect, with a rather mild and benevolent cast of face. The traveler upon the streets of Washington would hardly believe that the plain and unassuming gentleman passing him is the one who holds so much of the fate of our great armies in his hands.

CONSTANTINOPLE FIRE DEPARTMENT—SAPPEUR POMPIER.

FORT UNION, WASHINGTON TERRITORY, ABODE OF THE ST. LOUIS FUR COMPANY.

DEPTHS OF THE SEA.—A French journal says the soundings effected with reference to the new transatlantic cable have enabled comparisons to be made of the different depths of the sea. Generally speaking, they are not of any great depth in the neighborhood of continents; thus the Baltic, between Germany and Sweden, is only 120 feet deep; and the Adriatic, between Venice and Trieste, 130 feet. The greatest depth of the Channel between France and England does not exceed 300 feet, whilst to the south-west of Ireland, where the sea is open, the depth is more than two thousand feet. The seas to the south of Europe are much deeper than those in the interior. In the narrowest part of the Straits of Gibraltar the depth is only 1,000 feet, while a little more to the east it is 3,000. On the coast of Spain the depth is nearly 6,000 feet. At 250 miles south of Nantucket (south of Cape Cod) no bottom was found at 7,800 feet. The greatest depths of all are to be met with in the Southern Ocean. To the west of the Cape of Good Hope 16,000 feet have been measured, and to the west of St. Helena 27,000 feet. Dr. Young estimates the average depth of the Atlantic at 25,000 feet, and of the Pacific at 26,000.

A MAN in Scotland is said to be building a cotton mill, to be worked by mouse power. He has succeeded in training mice to work in a sort of treadmill, and the net profits of the labor of a single mouse amount to six shillings (or a dollar and a half) per annum. He intends to have ten thousand mouse mills in operation, and, after paying all expenses, expects to realize from $10,000 to $12,000 per annum.

THE planet Uranus, which was discovered by Herschel on the 13th of March, 1781, completed its first revolution round the sun on the 19th of August; that is to say, in 84 years and seven hours it came back to that position in the heavens in which it was first seen.

On catching my eye, he said with a smile, "It is as well to be right and ready, for no man can say which way such schlimme Thieren (terrible brutes) may take when put to it;" and as I was at the same time holding my stick by the thin end, he furthermore added, "Don't you, however, attempt anything, since all you could do with that stick would be no more to one of these boars than to a wild bull, and only serve to bring mischief on yourself;" and he instanced the case of some former Fremder like myself, who had joined in this sort of diversion, and who in giving a cudgel blow lost his balance, and was laid open, to use his own homely phrase, "as quickly as a body might split a pea-cod."

I wished the fellow and his story far enough, for I had from my very boyhood a horror, and I may say a mortal fear, of the whole hog species, and had any time sooner confronted a lion or tiger than a savage boar of even the ordinary kind; and yet, in good sooth, here was I gratuitously forming a stop-gap before a whole herd of the wildest and most ferocious class.

Preparatory to action there was, of course, a round of Schnapps—nothing in the way of venture being done in Germany without this whet—and though I came quite unprovided, my old friend was true to me in my extremity, and never came a whet of Kimmel more timely to my lips. He moreover took the opportunity of giving me a little final instruction, and pointedly dwelt on the worst, by saying:

"Now mind you bear to my left if there be any dash through on the right, and the reverse, you understand, if menaced from the opposite side," an injunction which I promised strictly to obey, and, involving the precise line of conduct I had already hit on in my own mind, he might assuredly count on its most scrupulous fulfillment.

But a short bugle call from headquarters ended our debate, and this was followed by a laisser-aller of some half-a-dozen dogs that went off, all eye, ear, and protruding tongue, right into the cover plot. Some of the Jägers, and no doubt such as constituted the best shots, stepped out of the circle a few paces in advance at the same time.

Old Zieten, with his fierce hussar attendant, could not have issued from the wood more suddenly than a huge boar, with his bristly staff, now did from the cover into which the eager hounds had dashed. Nor could any of your boasted generals cast a more knowing glance or present a more defiant mien, than this porcine chief did, as, with mane erect, the circling foe was surveyed, and then, with a clashing of tusks only to be remembered with a shudder, on he came.

I have no clear recollection as to what immediately followed, but perfectly remember how those eyes of fire bore point blank towards me, and what a rattle of rifles, din of shouts, dog yells, and indescribable sounds burst forth at the very moment I made for my fugleman's support, and in my flurry tumbled over that tree stump, and became immersed in a snow-drift. This served so to complete my bewilderment that, although unmistakable splashings of the brute's very foam and blood were on my shoes when I got up, I could not for my life say in which direction or how he passed me; but, as there was an impression that I had actually been under dental treatment, I felt down both my sides, and examined both legs, inside as well as out, for the satisfaction of those who pressed about me, as well as to clear the matter in my own mind, for, without feeling hurt, they made me fancy that I must have had a slight rip somewhere.

A drop more "kimmel" accomplished the rest, and as the battue was pretty well over, I went to the spot where this fearful monster lay stretched on the frozen ground, with blood oozing from some half-dozen bullet-holes and a gash in the throat, from which the last of the fierce tide of life was slowly ebbing.

The woodman with his axe must have been equally taken aback, for, in place of striking at the right moment, he never struck at all, but flung his formidable weapon after his flying foe, and for aught it had done he might have flung it aside altogether. I heard this as they were laughing at him; whilst I, whose performance had been most laughable of all, seemed to stand well in general estimation as one who had been simply knocked over by the boar, and escaped his tusk miraculously.

They counted eighteen head, two boars of the first order, which were to be dispatched forthwith to King Ludwig at Munich, three of the second class, four sows, and the rest young fry under six months old.

The main trophy was the very brute that had figured as commander-in chief and led the charge so desperately in the direction I occupied, and certainly as he there lay dappling his snowy resting-place with blood, a more hideous or a more fiend-like object never met my eyes. The head, from snout to ear point, could not have been much under two feet in length, and in one of the ears was a bullet hole of long standing to settle the point of his being an old campaigner. Indeed the forest frères recognized him as a former acquaintance, who had run the gauntlet, and probably expected to do so here again; but wiser heads get wrong in their calculations, and men fall under them as well as hogs. For the rest, the large main bristles were nearly eight inches long, tusks about seven, and his hoofs almost as strong as a donkey's. Yet there was nothing like the fleshy character of the hog race as we know it, and, with ample framework for sustaining a quarter of a ton, I very much doubt if the entire weight of this finest specimen of the wild hog reached two hundred pounds.

ENGLISH BAKERS.

What is a baker's life? In what is called the London season, and at the high-priced shops, the men begin work at about eleven o'clock at night, when other folks are thinking about going to bed. They are engaged in bread making, with a few short intervals (during which they try to catch forty winks), until seven or eight in the morning: baking the plain loaves, the fancy bread, the rolls, &c., in certain routine. They are then engaged several hours in carrying out bread, with an occasional dose of biscuit baking in the afternoon. If they get six hours' freedom from the shop in the evening for their main supply of sleep, it is about as much as they can reckon upon. Their work during the day, although in the open air, is by no means light, for they have to carry heavy baskets and wheel heavy trucks or barrows. Friday is a harder day than the rest, because they have to provide for nearly two days' consumption; they enter the bakehouse an hour or so earlier than on other evenings, and make a longer night's work of it. Saturday night is the only one on which the poor baker feels himself at liberty to tuck himself comfortably into bed for a good long sleep, like a Christian; he has no batch to attend to on that night. His Sunday is not much of a Sunday to him, seeing that he must attend two or three times during the day to prepare the "ferment" and "sponge" for the night's baking—else, as things are now managed, we should have no hot rolls on Monday morning, and no bread at all by Monday evening or so. Bad as this is, the workmen employed by the cheap bakers lead a still harder life. As most of the bread is sold over the counter, there is very little out door work to do; the poor drudge hasn't even the pleasure of taking out the basket, which would give him an opportunity to have a little chat with Mary, the nurse-maid, round at No. 4. From Thursday evening till Saturday evening these men almost live in the bakehouse, so great is the work done to supply an ample stock of bread by the time when working men and their families begin to spend the Saturday night's wages. Then, again, working people have baked dinners on Sunday to an extent quite beyond the experience of families in a better station in life; these dinners are baked mostly by the cheap bakers, and add to the Sunday labors of the journeymen and apprentices. In autumn, when genteel folks go out of town, the West-end bakers are more at leisure, and the delivery of bread is ended by two or three o'clock in the afternoon; this gives the men an evening of eight or nine hours duration for amusement and bed. But poor families have no out of town season; the cheap bakers who supply them make about as much bread at one time of the year as another, and the fags in the bakehouse know of no change—except additional heat in summer. The details differ at different times and in different localities; but it is admitted that, in a general way, this is not an over-colored picture of a baker's life.

THE DUBLIN EXHIBITION—THE HIGHEST PRIZE AWARDED TO THE GROVER & BAKER MACHINES.—On Monday morning Earl Russell announced the awards to the successful exhibitors in the International Exhibition, Dublin, and the prizes were afterwards presented by the Duke of Leinster. Among the exhibitors who obtained medals were the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, Liverpool and London, this being the fifteenth first-class prize gained by these machines this season.—Liverpool Mercury.

Splendid Jewelry, Watches, Diamonds, &c.

The House of BOSANQUET, GIRAUD & Co., Paris, have the pleasure of announcing that they have opened an Agency in the City of New York, for the sale of their widely known Jewelry, Watches, &c., and for the purpose of making their goods as extensively known and appreciated in the United States as they now are, and have been for over 70 years in Europe, they have determined on a plan by which poor and rich alike may have the advantage of their splendid styles. As a preliminary, they would remark that they manufacture and sell NO IMITATION JEWELRY or WATCHES, but

All are Warranted Gold of the Finest Workmanship.

Our customers will also have the great advantage of a constant succession of New and Recherche Styles and Patterns with which we shall keep our New York Agency supplied.

We have adopted the plan of sale now so popular, of charging a uniform price, and this price will invariably be $2 FOR EACH ARTICLE, no matter how costly it may be. The expenses of conducting our New York Agency are paid by the sale of Certificates, or Coupons representing the various articles. These Certificates are sold at 50 cents each, or three for $1, and each Certificate will show the holder the particular article he or she is entitled to, on payment of an additional $2. If the article named on the Certificate is not desired, the holder will oblige us, when he returns the Certificate, by stating what other article of the same value, he or she may prefer, and it will be sent with pleasure.

OUR AIM IS TO PLEASE, and every means to that end will be exerted. We solicit a trial from every one who reads this notice, as we are confident of giving the utmost satisfaction.

THE STOCK COMPRISES

THE HIGHEST PREMIUM, A SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL, was awarded us by the late great FAIR of the AMERICAN INSTITUTE, over all competitors, for the best instruments.

"A Gold Medal was awarded to CARHART, NEEDHAM & CO., for the best Reed Instrument on exhibition—a most just testimonial. The award for the second best Instrument of this class was made to James M. Pelton, exhibitor and agent of the Peloubet organ; and the third award was given to Mason & Hamlin."—Watson's Art Journal.

"I can speak of them in the highest terms." G. W. MORGAN.

"The finest Instruments of the class I ever saw." GEO. F. BRISTOW.

"The best Instruments of their class." WM. A. KING.

"The tone is incomparable, far in advance of any other instrument of a similar kind." CHAS. FRADEL.

CALKINS & CO., 558 and 560 Broadway, N. Y., are the appointed Managers for the Cosmopolitan Association of Manufacturers, which has been organized with the special object of doing away with the enormous profits exacted from the people by jobbers and wholesale and retail dealers in their goods, making articles, for which the manufacturers receive, on the average, but $2, cost the customer, at retail, from $6 to $12, after passing through three or four hands. This splendid stock of the leading and most fashionable styles of Solid Gold jewelry—watches, silverware, &c., worth $2,500,000 at retail prices—will all be sold by Messrs. CALKINS & Co., managers for the association, for $500,000, (manufacturers cost) or an average of $2 for each and every article, subject to the following regulations:—

SEALED ADVERTISEMENTS of the various articles are well mixed, and when ordered are taken out indiscriminately and sent by mail without regard to choice, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the advertisement you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send two dollars and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our list, WARRANTED GOLD, FOR ONLY TWO DOLLARS, and they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the money at ordinary retail price, for there are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the least article, whatever it may be, can be exchanged for a splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $10, or a Fifty Picture Morocco Photograph Album, worth $6. Send 25 cents for an envelope.

Each envelope contains a valuable collection of useful receipts and popular songs, worth many dollars.

Persons ordering envelopes will receive them promptly by mail, postage paid, together with the following premiums upon sending the cash.

1 for 25 cts.,	with a beautiful Photograph worth		25 cts.
5 for $1.00	" Silver Nut Pick	"	$1.00
11 for 2.00	" Silver Napkin Ring	"	2.00
17 for 3.00	" Silver Fruit Knife	"	3.00
30 for 5.00	" Gold Pen, Ext. Case	"	6.00
65 for 10.00	" Gold Double Locket	"	12.00
100 for 15.00	" Fine Silver watch	"	18.00
200 for 30.00	" Silver Hunting Watch	"	40.00

In all cases, upon receipt of the money, the premiums as above will be sent with the envelopes.

From the Press.

The Great Gold Gift Distribution.

We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Jewelers Association, with the "enterprises" so often advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser finds, upon investigation, to be mere catchpenny affairs, gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the fag ends of worthless stocks, from the second hand establishments of the East. Not an article is sold by Messrs. Calkins & Co. but is worth all it is represented to be; and, indeed, the well known character and reputation of the firm itself is a sufficient guarantee for the responsibility of the association they represent. Were such not the case, visitors would not throng their establishment in this city, at 83 and 85 Madison street, as they now do, nor would they go away with faces so bright with smiles of satisfaction. Chicago Post, April 1st, 1865.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every regiment, and to those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

Addess CALKINS & CO., Managers, Headquarters, 558 and 560 Broadway, N. Y., or, if nearer, 36 South Fourth street, St. Louis, Mo., or 83 and 85 Madison street, Chicago, Ill, Something New in the Card World!

A COMPLETE REVOLUTION!

TIME FOR A CHANGE!

Foreign Emblems used long enough by the American People.

NATIONALITY EVERYTHING!

The American Card Co.,

Conceiving that the introduction of

NATIONAL EMBLEMS

In the place of Foreign, in Playing Cards, will be hailed with delight by the American people, take pleasure in presenting the

UNION PLAYING-CARDS

as the first and only GENUINE AMERICAN CARDS ever produced—in the fullest confidence that the time is not distant when they will be the Leading Cards in the American market. The suits are—

Eagles, Shields, Stars and Flags,

GODDESS OF LIBERTY in place of Queen, COLONEL for Knave, and MAJOR for Jack.

In playing with these Cards, they are to be called by the names the Emblems represent, and as the Emblems are as familiar as household words everywhere among the American people, they can be used as readily the Britannican as Cards bearing foreign emblems.

THE UNION PLAYING-CARDS

Are put up, each Pack, in neat, handsome Boxes, suitable to keep them in when not in use; these are put up in elegant dozen boxes for the trade. Two Packs mailed free on Receipt of $1; or One Dozen Packs $4. Address

IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, the most Reliable and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is NOVELESS in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with BOBBIN OR SHUTTLE, makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making it self-acting to each evolution of the wheel. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Braid, Bind, Cord, Quilt, &c. &c. requires no Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a LIFETIME; being original it is no infringement on any other Machine. This is now a small Sized Machine purposely to hand over the work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work is much more handsome than by hand.

"The beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch and the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Safe delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicines. FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 541—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 2, 1865. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 10 Weeks $1 00

The Gathering Storm.

It is strange that the European editors, in full view of the expressions of both houses of Congress, should believe, or affect to believe, that the United States has abandoned the cherished principle of the total exclusion of foreign, and especially monarchical, interference in the domestic and international affairs of this continent. They, perhaps, make this deduction from the circumstance that this principle is being violated and contemned every day, on our very border, without governmental protest or opposition, and with the apparent acquiescence of the people. We have been accused of eternally publishing the "Monroe Doctrine," and flaunting the flag bearing it with persistent and insulting zeal in the face of Christendom, and because we do so no more, foreigners seem to suppose that, instead of putting it at the head of our armies, we have quietly folded up the well-worn banting, and stowed it away in the national garret. Fear, and a prudential instinct (for which Europe is beginning to give us credit), are generally supposed to be the motives influencing our conduct; and England, characteristically enough, seems to think that the prospect of a brisk trade with Mexico, in case of the success of the Empire, may reconcile us to a repudiation of a hitherto cherished article of our national creed.

Did it ever occur to our astute contemporaries, that when men really feel their strength, and begin seriously to think of action, they leave off blustering? When is the lion most dangerous, when "roaring" through the jungle that crushes beneath his feet, or when silently crouching for a spring?

When the House of Representatives quietly, and without debate, passed Mr. Winter Davis's resolutions reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine, with pointed reference to Mexico, they appreciated the importance and solemnity of their action. There was no attempt "to make the American eagle scream"—an amusement in which most foreigners have been induced to believe is the principal one in which our people indulge, only relieved by bowie-knife and Lynch law practice. When the Senate, last winter, amended the clause of the bill making an appropriation for the mission to Mexico, so that it should read "to the Republic of Mexico," that significant act was done unanimously and equally without debate. The signing of the Declaration of Independence was not done with greater dignity and earnestness than was displayed by both Houses of Congress, when they were called upon to show to the world that, notwithstanding the nation was racked by civil war, it could never forget or surrender that most sacred and vital principle of its exterior policy, embodied in what is called the Monroe Doctrine.

The people at large has followed the lofty and decorous example of its representatives. If they have said but little, it has been because they have felt more. They have felt that French intervention in Mexico and Central America, and Spanish intervention in Santo Domingo, Peru, and Chili, in open and contemptuous violation of the cardinal and distinctly avowed principle of the national policy, was a deliberate insult, heightened by every circumstance of unfriendliness and injury. They looked upon it not only as an act of bad faith, but of mean and cowardly spite, which they are bound to resent and punish. We are aware that there are many, perhaps, we might say, most of our people, who have thought, and still think, that the intervention on this continent will fall before the simple frown of a reunited Republic, and cover its abettors with confusion and contempt, much greater than if it were terminated by armed opposition. The wretched fiasco of Spain in Santo Domingo, gives some color to such anticipations. But while disposed to abide for awhile the course of events, those who indulge in these anticipations, equally with those who do not, are all sternly determined that the whole power of the country shall be put forth to vindicate the great principle enunciated by Monroe.

Americans are indisposed to quarrel with France, and our soldiers are rather disposed to fraternize with, than fight the French armies. They are loth to shed the blood of men against whom they have no feelings of animosity, traditional or otherwise; they do not wish to rouse a national antagonism where none exists. They know this faithless intervention in Mexico is not inspired by the French people. But they will hold that people as enemies, make them such for centuries, and fight the French power on sea and land to the bitter end, unless the wanton, unfriendly, insulting policy of Louis Napoleon is abandoned, and his soldiers withdrawn from Mexican soil. Let them not be deceived by the assurances of their publicists, or the quieting utterances of the official Moniteur and its tenders, that the United States has acquiesced, or will ever do so, in the policy of their Emperor. His ambition and conceit is leading them to a war, such as the great Napoleon, in the plenitude of his strength, would have shrunk from, and, if possible, avoided.

Any delusions that may have existed on this point, as we said at the outset, will be rudely dispelled by the news which the next steamer will carry abroad, and which the European publicists will be wise not to disparage or undervalue. They had better prepare themselves, as well as their readers, through a just appreciation of this news, for the calm, but firm and irreversible stand which President Johnson will take on this subject, in his first message, and which will meet the unyielding support of Congress and the country.

We have elsewhere noticed the appointment of Gen. Logan as Minister to the Republic of Mexico, and have collocated the expressions of his opinion on the question of the day, with others equally significant from our cautious Secretary of State, and reticent Lieutenant-Exploded Fallacies.

DURING the past twenty years no two dogmas were more vehemently insisted on, by demagogues, than that negro slavery was the mainstay in our Southern States because the white man could not work there, and, second, that the Emancipation of the slaves would result in overwhelming the North with worthless blacks, who would degrade labor here, besides depreciating its value by a ruinous competition. The "poor, mean white" of the South justified his idleness and general shiftlessness by accepting or pretending to accept the teachings of his philosophical and political leaders, who could demonstrate by tremendous assertion, and reiteration, that all tropical and semi-tropical regions must remain under the dominion of savage nature or return to it, unless reclaimed by the labor of negroes, who will only work under compulsion. We were pointed, invariably, to Africa, the Mexican and Central American States, and the Antilles, for the proof of these assertions, and the evidence afforded to the contrary by Mr. Olmsted of the success of white labor in Texas, and the equally conclusive evidence afforded by the success of German labor around New Orleans, were either ignored entirely or bluntly contradicted. No account was taken of the different circumstances of our condition, physical, mental, moral and mechanical, which remove the Southern States from the operation of causes which have depressed or demoralized labor in other semi-tropical regions, and make all deductions from their condition inapplicable.

The war has, however, bravely cleared all this. The South mourns for few, white labor and the philosophers who spent all their lives in declaring and attempting to prove that no system of labor, except that of compulsory negro labor, could exist in the Southern States that white men could not work there and live, and that Emancipation would convert the whole region into a desert, and reinstate the wildest and alligator, are now as emphatic, but much more valued and trusted, in insisting that what they have always needed and now need most, is white labor and that skill and enterprise of which slavery was the repellent element. Even De Bow, that astonishing apostle of the old faith, now labors to prove that few parts of the world are so favorable for manual industry as those very districts where we were told only four years ago, no white man could safely exert himself beyond wielding the whip, racing horses, or playing faro! Dr. Nott is, probably, reviewing his philosophical and ethnographical inconsistencies, and we expect to see new and expurgated editions of his works in which it will appear that the South, if not the birthplace and original home of the white man, is where he has been so expected to attain his greatest development, and achieve the most wonderful results of mental and physical exertion.

We expect, because rather of the loose and impetuous generalizations of the Southern mind, than because of any complete warrant in fact. That there are many parts in the South where white labor, and we speak now of agricultural, manual labor, may prosper as well as in any part of the world, cannot be doubted. And it is certain that nine-tenths of the characteristic denials of the fact were made with a better knowledge, and to give support to the slave system. Yet it is equally undoubted that there are many parts of the South where negro labor is and must be more efficient and desirable than white labor. Here it will be needed, perhaps, for ever, and these districts are wide enough to occupy all the negro labor the country has got, or likely to get, for centuries. That this labor to be efficient must be compulsory, is a dogma of the same kind with those which have been relinquished under the "inexorable logic of events," and will expire with the certain success of a fair trial of free negro labor.

To export this labor, or by any irrational or oppressive system of laws or regulations, drive it away, would be a blunder in political economy into which none but the most prejudiced of the supporters of an exploded and extinct system could fall for a moment.

Here, at the North, the results of the war have given the lie emphatic to all the bugbears that political economists and the slave power, as to the consequences of Emancipation. Slavery is abolished, but where are the swarms of negroes who were to overrun our cities, and infect labor with pauperism and vice with the German labor? Under the excitement consequent on such predictions, and passionate appeals to prevent their realization, the ignorant and the selfish were led into the commission of crimes, but little over two years ago, disgraceful to the city, and from the very recollection of which we shrink in horror. Yet the negroes are not here, and we have less than two-thirds the number of negroes in this city than there were at the outset of the war!

Verily, the war has wrought a wondrous change in the feelings of the Southern philosophers! Verily, has it confounded the tongues of evil prophets in the North!

American Credit Abroad.

THE subjoined temperate communication, on a matter interesting to all good citizens, gives several sound reasons for the depreciation of American securities in foreign markets. If, as our correspondent seems to think, the failure of the Government to declare explicitly its intention to pay the principal on its loans in gold, is the reason why they will not be sold in the market, it might be worth the consideration of Congress whether supplementary legislation on the matter is not desirable. Or the ability of the Government to pay, in spite of its bonds fall due, there can be no reasonable doubt; and if a declaration that it will do so would bring our high-interest securities even up to the value of the low-interest ones we sold, it would enhance the value of those held in the United States alone, by not less than $600,000,000. As to the element of "uncertainty" referred to in our correspondent's letter, it was no doubt wise in the Government at the period when its securities were mainly issued, and when the future was a vast perspective of uncertainties, to retain some option to itself as to the time when it should be called on to respond to its obligations. Making loans, in ordinary times, when present and prospective resources were adequate, with reasonable certainty, is quite another affair; and if the depreciation of our securities is in any degree due to the cause assigned by our correspondent, the evil itself was unavoidable.

To the Editor of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

SIR—In your issue of the 11th inst., I observe able article on "American Credit Abroad," you say that "it is a matter of universal complaint, that the 5-20 and 7-30 United States securities are regarded (abroad) as worth less than one half their nominal value." This statement is not only "a libel on the credit of the United States stands below that of bankrupt Austria, Prussia and Spain, and equal to repudiated Brazil?" As an answer to these problems is given in answer that this may be owing to ignorance, and that when you very truly say is a practical question, involving not alone pecuniary interests, but, in fact, all of more consequence, the national character?

I would suggest that the matter rests entirely, in the name of a great many—I presume all—of your subscribers, for the simple reason that they have no regards repudiation. At a time when the political omens are that this may be avoided by action, and the honor of the nation be dragged in the dirt of waging warfare upon its creditors, it is a most serious subject, and, no matter who else may waver or turn aside, we are glad to know that the "old guard" among the nation's honor will suffer no hole.

I think it will be universally conceded that capital has no sympathy—that in questions of secure investments and profitable returns, the feelings are not enlisted in favor of a project which, besides returning the capital invested, will return a beneficial end, it must be allowed that charity, to a certain extent, governs all enterprises. For, should the dividends be small, or, fail altogether, what is the result? The capital is lost. Insolvency of the per cantage is made up by the sense of charity, consequently, it is lost in a great many instances. A familiar one is contained in Wesley's celebrated declaration, to the best of my memory, "Lend to the poor, lendeth to the Lord." "Brethren, if you like uncertainty, choose the 5-20 bonds."

I imagine, therefore, that foreign capitalists must be regarded of United States securities as "worth less" simply because our securities do not find favor with them. Should treachery, fraud, embezzlement, absolutism, or democracy are not what are discounted in London and Paris, as capital seeks safety in the business through whose hands the enormous annual earnings of the Government indirectly flow, seeking some outlet called investment, you must present two elements, security and remunerative. The question now do the U. S. Government and State Bonds stand? Both, as to the former. Virginia, Tennessee, Massachusetts and Alabama, which have paid part, if not all the interest of their debts, and the last, a debt of repudiation attaches to them all, that is, they all pay the interest on their colleges, and are thus secondly bound to pay in specie. This may seem an ugly word—but it is one of interest. It is the key to the vaults of the leading merchants and capitalists of this city, on which rests the fate of this State, nearly every deciding by her Legislature to pay the interests of her securities in currency instead of gold, and, if any pecuniary moves me rightly, several of these honorable gentlemen affirm it, and have it in their power to put pockets, to redeem the honors of the State, while they can command in terms, for stronger than I dare to use, the absence of moral rectitude in those at Albany, who controlled our financial interests.

It would only be in this case a rhetorical flourish, to assert that while each of the members of a body politic is wanting in honorable principles, their aggregate could possess a virtue which the several parts had not. The greatest condemnation of the action of the individual States, is found in the fact that the bonds of the United States maturing since the introduction of legal tender paper-money have been invariably paid in gold, such as the Texas Indemnity Bonds, and some others.

So much for the security which State bonds can have in the eyes of foreign capitalists. The government at Washington has declared, and its action, as above stated, proves with the greatest sincerity, its intention to pay in gold all its debt contracted previous to the war. This, however, is but a small sum compared with its debt for carrying on the war—five hundred millions, and it is the quotation of those abroad to which I understand your remarks to refer. Are they based upon the same requirements of "security and permanence?" And here I make the assertion, which I know a strict investigation will fully bear out, that there is in the act authorizing the issue of these bonds no provision for the payment of the principal in gold at maturity. Again, that nothing can be gotten from the statistics of the Committee of Ways and Means, who drew up the bill, than to make the principal payable in gold, and, what is more important in the matter, that fact is well known to Britain capitalists, through their private inquiries, made in Washington. Now, how much in any such case would be found the loan here to consist or deny it. You may have seen, as I have, the cautious terms in which the replies of the Secretary of the Treasury to letters requesting information on the point, were couched. The replies were published in the papers, and in no instance did the Government commit itself by any pledge in the matter. It was the intention of the government! "If circumstances would permit," was the such like non-committal phrases. Never was it said that Congress had passed a law for ultimate redemption in gold, and, for the best of all reasons, it did not.

Again, when a capitalist loans his money, it is desirable he should know when it is to be repaid, and at the option in which the payment is to be made favorable terms. By having the option of repayment at any time between five and twenty years, the government always introduces an element of uncertainty prejudicial to its loan. It is the only way, or an attempt, to criticise the terms of the loan which, perhaps, were wise, under the circumstances, but it is enough to deter foreign capitalists do not "cry for it." It is equally far from my wish to appear to think that the United States government will pursue a course which they legally might, but the fact remains that it has not declared for it, in the month of August, 1867, when the first installment of the loan becomes due, and the last in 1887. Foreign capitalists know this, and in the uncertainty as to what political party may be in power at the time courses, can it be wondered at that the loan is at a heavy discount? Should any change in the present democracy, and last-repentant secession succeed in the endeavor to pay the war debt in paper, you perceive the change in opinion, and think the more of it held abroad the better. SCARAB.

FOR two years, ever since President Juarez left the capitol of Mexico, we have had no Minister in that country. A gentleman, formerly Secretary of Legation, was appointed to reside in the city of Mexico, in charge of the archives of the Legation, but in no recognized official capacity. Last winter, when the Loan and Diplomatic appropriation bill came up in the Senate, the clause making appropriation for the mission to Mexico, was so amended as to read "to the Republic of Mexico." The substitution was by a unanimous vote. President Johnson has now filled that mission to the Republic of Mexico by the appointment of Major-General Logan, formerly an able member of Congress, and during the war one of our most efficient officers, for the appointment to the Mexican question are quite as decided as those of Gen. Sheridan. At a public meeting held in the city of Philadelphia, on November 30, he said:

"So far as I am concerned, I believe that Maximilian is holding Mexico to-day in pit and parcel of the rebellion against the government. (Cheers.) * * That was a part of the rebellion; it is a part of it to-day, and the sympathies of the United States are not only to put Maximilian: 'Sir, you must pack up your duds and travel.' Instead of sending another tremendous contribution of cheering. The government has not supposed, nor should it suppose, that it could, for one, don't propose to give that state to Maximilian. I consider, am as the head of the government saying to him: 'You were induced by the rebellion to take possession of that country, and to attempt to establish yourself there. I tell you, sir, you must step! You must not get out of that country, and leave it to its people."

We do not assume to say that these emphatic opinions of Gen. Logan at all influenced his appointment, but they are hereby heretofore pursued by the Secretary of State, and which has by no means been up to the public sentiment, we should think, of the country. There has, however, been lately a marked advance in the ideas controlling the Department of State, which people think is due to the direct influence of the Executive. We trust that the inward ventured, in his Auburn speech, October 20th, albeit with habitually cautious phraseology, to say:

"I expect that we shall as republican institutions wherever they have been established. Already throughout the American continent, speedily vindicated, reserve to the people."

No such expectation can be realized with Maximilian in Mexico, or Spain marauding in South America, while the Monroe doctrine remains, as it is, that republican institutions must be vindicated, and the republic renewed and strengthened in fidence. We trust that these utterances, however, of the man whom the nation most delights to honor, and on whom the work of "vindication of republican institutions in Mexico would mainly devolve if undertaken by the State, as of more consequence than the cautious periods of our venerable Secretary of State. On the occasion referred to, a dinner to the United League Club, Gen. Grant was welcomed by Mr. Beckman in the following words:

"I hope you will excuse me from thanking you at any great length. But there is one sentiment uttered by Gen. Grant that I will refer to. It is the one touching the future of Mexico." (Cheers.)

On other occasions, when the deliverance of Mexico was discussed, the General has observed "count me in." We think the phrase can be translated into French, without losing its significance. It might furnish food for reflection in the Tuileries.

SOME years since, Baron Liebig, after many experiments, discovered a plan of making an "extract of meat," by which its bulk, nourishment for nourishment, was reduced to one-thirtieth. His plan was tried on the Continent, and at length taken up by a German settler in Uruguay, who established a factory at Fray Bentos. This establishment, which is to be greatly extended, exports about 4,000 lbs. of the preparation every year, and it can be purchased at 15s per 100lbs. That quantity will make soup for 120 men, and we are told, on excellent authority, that the extract is now being tried in several English hospitals, with the best result. The soup, though not always nice, great care being required in the manufacture, is decidedly superior in nourishing qualities to the best beef tea, and, from its comparative cheapness, will probably supersede it.

CAPT. SIR EDWARD BUTLER recently stated that the rate of speed in the ships of the British navy was far inferior to that of the ships of the American navy. And the result of a test trial "the navy which had the fastest ships would be certain to have the upper hand in war. The object to be gained was to be able to run right over the enemy's vessel by the possession of greater speed."

IT is affirmed that the fibre so well known in India and China under the name of China grass can be used to mix with cotton with great economy. Experiments with it have been made in Rouen, and the Chamber of Commerce there has reported in its favor, as being cheap, strong, and easy to dye. One Rouen professor has willingness to take a ton a day, and the only question is as to the quantity procurable. At present this is limited; but, although it is not to be considered indefinitely, we question if the fibre will prove in the end cheaper than cotton, which grows in half the parts of the world, and is everywhere thoroughly understood.

IF there were any doubts as to the "Fenians" being true Irishmen, it would be dispelled by the term applied to their highest officer. He is called "Head Centre." If there a "Centre," a "Right Centre," or a "Left Centre," or a "Middle Centre?" And if not, why not?

THE rebel leaders have now almost all of them settled down into private life. Gen. Lee is the head of a college in Virginia; Gen. Joseph Johnston is a splendid horse president or overseer of a Georgia railroad; Gen. Bragg is in business in New Orleans; Gen. Hardee lives on a plantation in the interior of Alabama; Gen. Longstreet has been pardoned, and is in Mobile; Gen. Forrest, the butcher of Fort Pillow, is managing a sawmill, it is said, in the interior of Mississippi; and Gen. Beauregard is in New Orleans, and has applied, it is believed, for a railway appointment. Only Generals Buckner, Sterling Price, Early and Wheeler, of all the rebel generals, are said to have left the country.

FRANK LESLIE'S CHIMNEY CORNER

As a new volume of this, undoubtedly the most successful literary weekly, only periodical paper in America, has just commenced, we cannot forbear a few remarks.

The American public needed a good family paper, entertaining and instructive, without lending itself to false and unnatural sensation on the one hand, or making itself contemptible by dullness on the other. The CHIMNEY CORNER has admirably supplied the want. This elegant and attractive paper contains, besides its new and appropriate engravings, columns filled with tales by powerful writers, instructive matter in history, biography, not of kings and aristocracy, but of nature's nobles—the self-made men, the memorable women, the help-ers who have advanced science; lessons drawn from natural history, science, travels, adventures, the past and the present.

Everybody will welcome this guest will prove, by their enlightened conversation, the charm and solidity of the paper which is their companion and friend.

TOWN COSSIP.

WHO would believe, to walk the length of Broadway, that there was a country just recovering from a great civil war—and that, according to financial economies, the land had been drained of its resources which men and labor only will recuperate?

As political economists and press may say, it must be the fault of the people. We are a wonderful country, we are a wonderful-one. Europeans have always declared that New York is the fastest city of the world. Now, it is the most brilliant country. In length of promenade it has no equal in this country, and we believe that in the beauty of its women, the display of its stores, and the noise of its streets, it has no equal in the world. From one o'clock to five P. M., every day, it would be seen on the Broadway every conceivable attraction offered in the saison upon its length.

We claim the past few years, at certain times of the day, and especially on Sunday, when it is seasonable to be seen there in full dress, that Broadway has achieved seriously as a promenade. We have no doubt that the time will come, within a quarter of a century, when Broadway will rival the Boulevard des Italiens avenue entirely, as it has done upon London and Paris precedents, and that the now fashionable avenue will be, as it now is in many parts, deserted. Never has Broadway the wholesale trade will have monopolized everything fashionable.

Fifth avenue, at present, is a street of 45 blocks, more than twice the length of the promenade part of Broadway. It has many splendid residences, all of fine class, except a few shanties near the Park, monuments of the olden time. It may safely be said that of these 300 houses not one cost less than $20,000, and from that up to $200,000, which will be the price of Mr. A. T. Stewart's when it is finished. Of these houses, some are said to be of white marble, and to have a front of 90 feet, and a depth of 200 feet. While this is building, the dry goods monarch lives in a little chancy, just opposite, which might, on a pinch, bring about $70,000 at auction.

A few doors away lies the residence of Mr. Wm. B. Astor, the richest man in New York. It is a modern-looking building, suggestive of a stiff bank account, in built of respectable brick, trimmed with brown stone, and is worth, perhaps, about $75,000.

Very few of the houses are to be rented, but are occupied by the owners; but if any are ever to rent, they can be had at various rents, ranging from $4,000 per annum (never less) up to the gentle and genial rental of $12,000. A few furnished houses can be had upon this economic and healthy for about $600 per month—which shows that a man should not attempt to live on Fifth avenue until he is worth $150,000, or about $10,000 a-year, with which, with delicacy, he can manage to scratch along.

The Fifth avenue is a place capable of a volume. It is, without doubt, the most elegant street in America; but it suffers, as all fashionable places must suffer, by the tremulous nature of worldly affairs. Money will turn its way in anywhere, and especially is money ambitious of many a residence on Fifth avenue. It is never a question of shoddy, there would be no fault to find; but Fifth avenue has, within the last year or two, suffered seriously in reputation by the erection of several shabby tenements, upon its most fashionable points, by people, whose reputations are world wide and notorious. The worst instance of this is just below 14th Park, where a great edifice looms up, stately and rich in exterior, handsome and commodious, built from the purse of a woman who served a term at Blackwell's Island, and whose notorious crime is a byword in every mouth. There she has seated herself, in all the severe splendor of wealth, her great palace frowning upon the street, while, in the basement, madame sits, a partial and private bawd, entertaining, mirrored and mirrored, and behind the sympathy and respect that all her wealth cannot buy, even in this city, where, we are told, it can buy anything.

But enough of Fifth avenue, let us to something else. What is there in the city of New York becoming a representative of the Forty-first Precinct?

Coroner Jarvis was called to hold an inquest on a woman found dead at No. 31 Richardson street, Brooklyn. On entering the house he found the most horrible spectacle. In one corner of the wretched, unfurnished, foulsome apartment, by the dead and mutilated body of the woman, with nothing beneath her but a few carpet rags and newspapers and sun-rags. In the other corner her husband lay dying, while huddled together in the middle of the room were four children, the eldest about five years of age, all in the most wretched state of rags and starvation.

By the evidence elicited it appeared that the family had only been in the house two months in the country from many. The husband was sick, and the hospitable neighbors and other then and present occupants, with the wife literally died of starvation and exposure, and had they not been discovered by the authorities, twenty-four hours more would have settled the whole family. As it was they were all taken to Bellevue, in hopes are entertained that the balance of them, or at least the children, may live. There is no such a great people!

By the ordinary transition of thought from the poor, poor, friendless strangers, dying for the want of help and employment, we are naturally led to the entire subject of strangers obtaining employment in the city, and the peculiar manner in which it is obtained, or what are called "intelligence offices" or "employment agencies." Every part of which, as an agency for swindling shops, kept by people who are afraid to steal openly and who only lay by to weep. They prosper largely, and, to any one applying, promise to obtain them just what they want. The fee for doing so is so trifling as to give dollares, according to the situation, payable in advance. The poor dupe pays, waits, and waits, and waits, and in nineteen out of the case, the office man catches a tartar, who promises a general rumpus and a knock-down to any one not get justice. In such a dilemma he is bought off as cheap as possible, generally by a return of half the fee, but he soon relies that the office, having once got the victim in his toils, keeps him waiting for the special chance, and that the fee is never free from him, until he has bled his customer dry and disgusted with the whole affair, leaving the swindler the profit of the transaction. There should be redress for such rascality, but it is one of the evils of a city like this city that the police do not see, and, as a consequence, there is but very little redress at all, which is left to the victim to take the law in his own hands and redress himself.

At the theatres there is little that is new. Niblo's has Mr. Forrest still playing to good houses, and "Adrienne Fogue" the other three, both attractions that crum the house, and, in some cases, standing room only, before after the curtain goes up.

The Winter Garden has, through the last two weeks, had the only real sensation, in the person of Mr. John Brougham, who has been lied, serenaded, made speeches every night, and gone through a general lionization, and is to be the lot of many more men in life. Friday night, the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick attended his benefit in a body, and marched through some of the worth's band serenaded him at the New York Hotel.

Wallack's is playing Mandeville's fine old comedy of "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," one of, if not the finest of the English comedies.

At Irving Hall, on Saturday night, Fr. John Prume made his debut in this city. Mr. Prume is the violinist to the King of the Belgians, and nephew of the great composer Prume. His debut was made with Mrs. Harrison, and Messrs. Mills and Weeks, and Dresser as conductor.

Mr. Prume has an emphatic and brilliant execution, and is a master violinist. His efforts were received by the audience very favorably, and we are satisfied that while his style is that of a finished artist, he has about him all the elements of high popularity with the masses.

Miss Dolaro has again upheld the musical fame heretofore made. She has a beautiful voice, and sings most effectively.

The musicians of New York, headed by Mas Maretzek as chairman, are moving to co-operate with the London committee, to commence the erection of a Wm. Vincent Wallace, by the erection of a monument, and creating a fund for his family. Such a movement is proper, correct, and such other work as may tend to that end, and we feel sure that the musicians will not every rest in music, should join in the effort to show their appreciation of the talent of English composers, and one of the best and most genial of men.

PARADE OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The police of New York and Brooklyn made a grand parade in presence of the Governor of New York on the 16th of November. The force present, some 1,400, formed into four battalions, of nine companies each; the first battalion commanded by Capt. Jamieson, the second by Capt. Mount, the third by Capt. Walsh, and the fourth by Capt. Irving.

The police has been for some time past instructed by their drill master, Capt. Copeland, in Gen. Morris's tactics, and the grand manœuvres were performed with the accuracy of veteran. The advantages of the new system of drill, as a means of discipline and change of front, could not have been executed within the limits of the old method. The old method, in fact, was that the Boston Police was present, and expressed himself much gratified with the new tactics.

The column passed in review before the Mayor and Common Council, in front of the City Hall, and many by Gov. Fenton at the Fifth Avenue Hotel.

It has been devoted to issue of mounted muskets and equipments to the police, and to thoroughly instruct them as infantry soldiers.

Superintendent Kennedy and Inspectors Leonard and Carpenter took an active part in the ceremonies.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic—Gorge N. Sanders is growing "immensely unpopular" in Canada. Notwithstanding the undignified proceedings of the Judge who conducted the second trial of the prisoners charged with the attempt to abduct him, and the failure of the jury up for ten days, they refused to find a verdict for conviction. A third trial has been ordered, whereupon papers that have heretofore been regarded as of strong secession proclivities have taken Sanders to task. They predict that he has cost Canada more than a million of dollars, and ought to be sent to Jefferson Davis's quarters at once, country.

Quite an extraordinary billiard match has just been completed between two well known citizens at Denver. They agreed to play for $100 a game of one hundred points, and to continue the contest for a month. Cessation or cessation until the party most exhausted should agree to forfeit $500 to the other. They played sixty-two hours, and $13,000 was lost by the superior player, who pocketed the money and left the country. During the earlier portion of the contest, the stakes were $800 per game.

A countryman, named Marden, having partaken freely of "Forty-rod," was making his way, on foot to that city, on Friday last, seated himself upon a curb-stone to get rid of his potations, when he fell asleep to one side, he was soon strangled to death by the tight-but-buckskin breeches he was wearing.

Last year Miss Rogers, of Boston, took in charge a young girl of nine years of age, who became dead and blind from an illness. She died a few months after her months, the child was taught to articulate distinctly and understand the deaf and dumb alphabet of the kind what was said to her, so that she can now keep up a conversation with any one who will take the trouble to her facile fashion. She can recite the multiplication table so that she can tell you what is the product of any combination, obtaining the instruction wholly from the mobile fingers of her friend. The case is considered a remarkable case in that city, where a mother devoted herself several years to a day for one child, and that child a most interesting daughter. This young lady (for she is now grown) has been up with Miss Rogers since, and is now enabled to read any book aloud so as to be understood by the listener.

The only provident Indian on record is the Chippewa Indian, Wabasha, who died in Minnesota recently, a fine, splendid farm one mile square, with 1,000 head of cattle and horses, and an income of $5,000 a year, free of encumbrance.

—A western correspondent describes Kit Carson, now a resident of Taos, New Mexico, as a man of rather squat in stature, of compact, iron frame, and a most determined countenance. His features have a meaning an expression of great determination and reserved power. His eyes are dark, keen, and penetrating. His rather broad shoulder straps, his dark hair slightly sprinkled with gray, and his mustache, give him a soldier-is waterfall, wearing a broad-brimmed felt, and altogether presenting the appearance of a sturdy little mountaineer of the plains.

—The bones of Red Jacket are not buried, but are kept at the Buffalo Historical Society's rooms in that city. On the death of the great chief, he was buried on the Cattaraugus reservation, but his grave was robbed, and gradually chipped away, and the memorial otherwise defaced by too eager relic hunters. The Indians therefore removed to this reservation. Leading generals, and other distinguished men, lie in this cemetery in the new city cemetery, beyond the reach of the overzealous, and bones of Red Jacket will rest. Accordingly, they procured a leaden coffin; but his family, on examining the remains, found that the relic hunters had mauled the dust of the great orator, and ever since have guarded the grave with a watchful eye. His remains are now on foot, however, under the sanctions of the Buffalo Historical Society, to give the bones appropriate burial.

—A new line of American steamers is to be established between Boston and Liverpool, by the American Steamship Company. Two of the vessels are on the stocks in Boston harbor.

—We have often read pathetic speeches of Indian warriors on the eve of their departure, but what is the following by a Camanche chief, at the recent council, at Medicine Lodge Creek, is the most touching of all. Before you see, is in rags. When I return to my tribe, and say to them, "I have been to Washington, and they will not believe me if I return in this ragged shirt. My wife and children will say, 'Where is the good father who came gave you?' Brother, what shall I say about this when I return to my people?"

—A teacher in a colored school in Augusta, Ga., relates that she had a bright-looking, mischievous darkey in her school last week. He was the first beginning to learn him the alphabet. Pointing to a letter, she asked him what it was. "I don't know, ma'am, I reckon for a short time, and said: "I know dat well enough by de figgers, but I don't know de letters." Finally, he was told he could take a back seat.

—The Governor-elect of Mississippi, having been invited by the State Legislature to visit that body, declined on the ground that he was under parole to report parole. He expressed the hope soon to see the State Legislature in its old place, and closed his letter by adding: "With all of you I marched under that flag in the days gone by, and with all of you I fought, and if you I marched against it, and it was victorious. It and waves over us—our flag, and may it ever be victorious."

—The Batavia (N. Y.) Spirit of the Times says: "An unusual sensation was created in this village Saturday afternoon last. Mr. John McLean made a bet of $50 that he would ride a horse around the fair ground on the track—no reins to be used. He accomplished the feat in 9:16, to the great delight of a large number of spectators.

This pardon will warm into the heart of many a soldier who has laid, close to which his fisherman's but now stands.

—A Salt Lake letter states that the Mormon leaders are trying to get up a new gold excitement by force of arms, and defy openly the authority of the United States Government. Dr. Henry Collins, a recent letter in Chicago, said he was at a loss how to deal with the evils of Mormonism. He spoke of the Penitentiary was staring him in the face, and a family outside beckoning him home."

—A man named Henry Henke attempted to commit suicide in a public street of St. Louis, Mo., on Saturday last, by plunging a dagger into his breast. This is a woman named Bernard, 108 years of age, who has destroyed altogether, it is said, 30,000 vipers, for which she received a reward of 1,000 francs, up to which time she had kept them with which tempts the serpents from their holes, and then kills them.

—A British army officer—Capt. W. A. Baker, of the Royal Bombay Engineers—has just settled an action disputed date—the year in which the world will come to an end. The Captain, who is a believer in Daniel, entitled "The day and the Hour; or, Notes on Prophecy; a Sketch of the Visions recorded in the Bible," he imparts a considerable amount of information, which is to be found in the Book of Daniel, and, in a word, he tells us, is fixed for September 26, 1875; the hour, sunset. This translation of the Saints having previously taken place, about 3 o'clock in the morning, the 16th of January, 1876.

—It is stated that a regular organized band of murderers has been formed in Berlin. A Berlin paper says: "The Jew Lewy, a dealer in cattle, has been suddenly disappeared, leaving not a trace behind. A merchant of Berlin, named Lewinsky, on a journey from Kyritz, who had come to Berlin to buy tools; a Jew named Lewinsky, who had gone to Frankfort; and the daughter of a journeyman weaver, a young girl of 16, have disappeared in a similar manner. Nothing merchant, who had been a lieutenant in the Federal army; and, lastly, a master tailor of Berlin, have all disappeared mysteriously, and it is thought murdered."

—A new way has been discovered in Berlin for burying the dead. The corpse is taken from the bier, and buried in the ground at the depth of about a foot and a half. Then a tube, 3 feet long, is put down, and filled quite firm. It is then only necessary to beat it with a hammer, and the body is at once disjointed. To prevent any admixture of earth, it is better to enclose the body in a sack. A very large quantity of cream requires a rather longer time. This method is said not to fail, and the butter to be of a particularly fine quality.

—It is said that Queen Victoria has excited the wrath of the Scotch clanchiefs by appointing, lately, at Crathie, a Presbyterian church in Scotland, English churchmen and Episcopalians. American churchmen are very well aware that this is an age in which Christian denominations are few.

—Two veteran duellists in Nantes, France, went out in October to shoot at each other. Both are army officers, the Colonel of the Fifty-second Regiment. One has fought in 33 duels, the other in 23. In this last encounter the Colonel received a sword cut in his chest, but the steel having slipped the wound was slight. His adversary was thrust he wounded Fleurant in the right hand.

—A lamentable accident occurred lately at Geneva. A boy of seven years of age going through their manœuvres, and seven of them had ascended an escape ladder placed at the top of a house, when it suddenly broke, and six of the men were precipitated to the ground. The boy was killed on the spot, the others severely injured.

—The performances at the Prince of Wales Theatre, Birmingham, England, were recently brought to a sudden termination by the entrance of the police on the stage to arrest a woman for child stealing. A child being concerned in the Fenian movement. A large number of handbills and a variety of Fenian oaths and papers said to implicate many persons of high standing. The woman was remanded for examination.

—A very melancholy accident, which caused the death of three persons, and severely wounded others, has taken place at Villars, in the Department of Charente Inferieure. Fourteen persons had been placed against a large vessel in which the grapes were fermenting, when the cask burst with a loud report like cannon. The carbonic acid generated, instantly suffocated those who leaned over. His grandfather and grandmother, almost immediately died. Another was a babe.

—A young woman known at the public balls in the neighborhood of the Barrière de la Rue des Lois, Louise," has just committed suicide from love. She had been informed by her betrothed residing in the Rue des Gres, and was much attached to him, when all of a sudden he ceased to visit her, and was about to return to his friends to contract a marriage long agreed on. She was overwhelmed with grief at the loss of her lover, taking advantage of the momentary absence of the young man, she entered the room of the mistress of his room on a third floor, and was killed on the spot.

—A citizen of Birmingham, England, was lately killed by a singular accident. He had a long pipe in his mouth, and as he was entering the garden the bowl of the pipe struck against the gate with such force that the little end of the pipe-stem went through his head. The brain was instantly pushed under the tongue and caused death.

—A meeting to denounce Sunday trains was lately held in Manchester, England, at which it was stated that regularly every Sunday drives into town from his seat, some forty miles off, in a carriage and pair, with coachman and footman, to attend church.

—The Bishop of Meath has addressed a letter to his clergy, requesting the offering of special thanksgiving, with appropriate sermons, for the bountiful harvest with which the people of Ireland have been blessed.

—In London, on the other night, a man was going upstairs to bed, when he slipped and fell upon his wife, who was following him. They both rolled to the bottom, but while the man escaped with very slight injuries his wife was killed.

—Among the deaths recently registered in London was that of an infant from a splinter of wood, swallowed accidentally in a little sugar, causing perforation of the bowels.

—Tom Sayers, the ex-champion of England, is now lying in the last stage of consumption. His physician says he cannot survive many weeks.

—The Paris correspondent of the London Times writes about a column a day, and gets paid at the rate of $60 a column—$10,000 a year.

HOW PAPER COLLARS ARE MADE.

At the end of the first room are piles of pure white paper, awaiting their turn to be guillotined in a machine furnished with 25 steel blades, which cut the paper into the requisite strips for the collar, on precisely the same principle as a gigantic pair of scissors, that shaving a rough edge. The product of two paper mills is consumed in this factory, at the rate of a ton to a ton and a half per day. The average production here is about 1,000 dozen per week. Which is pretty well, despite the numerous imitations with which the market is glutted. From the strips of paper, the operatives cut the gutter, even strips of paper, they pass into the hands of another hir eacutioner, who brings the incipient collar under the knife, by which it receives a number of pair of lives, by which it acquires shape in an instant. Still another machine marches sentinel-like over the whole, as the operatives rise from embrace, the three button-holes are visible—large, clean cut, firm holding, and easily buttoned.

The collar is now placed between two dies or clamps, pressed under a great pressure, and when removed, shut, stamped with that close imitation of stitching, which renders it the perfect imitation of its linen cousin, and which no difference can hardly be distinguished; brother, the stitching is all by machinery, and the collar is stamped also with the size and the name of the manufacturer. The machine, which draws the collar-line, on which the shape of the collar depends, is also worked by steam power, and produces a smooth cut. They then pass through the similar machine by which the button-holes were made, and are finished off rapidly, turns the collar over, as no machine has yet been made to do, and the collar is complete. It passes to the moulding machine, where it is beat round into perfect shape, and is then ready for the market.

This process is an important one, requires skill in the operative, and is quite a study. The collar, subjected to the test, to resist the immense strain required to mould it into shape, is a strong one.

The collar is now, as it were, born, shapely, trim and neat, and ready for the public ken. It is then packed away, having passed through seven distinct processes in the manufactory, and at once more taken up by the women, and packed into boxes by the 100, or in the wholesale, by the gross. Each box is labeled with the number of collars it holds, either for a week in the country or for a month, or for a term of hours, and is then ready to spend over $60,000 per annum. The first machine turned out the collar, the second finished it, the third put it once, but slowly and imperfectly; but the genius of the inventor has set it by the rapid process of production for the article, added improvement after improvement, and the result is that the factory in question is capable of turning out 6,000,000 of collars per month.

The Linden Collar Company is the largest and best fitted manufactory 70 neatly dressed, intelligent-looking women are employed, and the wages are good. These women earn $1 per day, and their work is clean, healthy and agreeable. Where 50 hands are now employed to manufacture in the spring of 1863, has now 86 patents on collars and machines, having comprehensive control of the factories of the factories of the company went there this summer, with skilled mechanics and machinists, and have put in operation and publish the manufacture in England, France and Belgium, which the American model collars has achieved in this country.

THE LINNÆUS PLANT.—A valuable wine, manufactured from a plant bearing the botanical name of Linnæus, is now made in a large quantity in New York and Connecticut. In appearance the plant somewhat resembles the grape vine, but in fact it is entirely dissimilar in its chemical qualities. It will grow in any soil, and from the time it is set out in the spring, it is ready to be made into wine in the following year or August. It can be manufactured at a very much cheaper price. During the present season it has been manufactured largely at Stamford and Norwalk, Conn. The sworn statements of seven cultivators of those towns show that from 1,000 vines, which is about an acre of ground, there were produced, the present season, 1,000 gallons of wine. This was made in Conn. and August they manufactured therefrom 4,000 gallons of wine, the product of the vines now growing upon 4 acres of ground. The cost of the vines per acre is $2,50 per gallon. One of them, an experienced horticulturist, says that "Linnæus will produce more than wine, in many of its qualities, "is superior to any ever manufactured in this country, and equal to the best made in Europe." The plant is being extensively cultivated in Connecticut, and in many counties in this State. United States District-Attorney Dickinson, Ex-Governor Seymour, Congressman Hotchkiss, and other prominent citizens of Connecticut have taken hold of the matter, and their wine possesses "a beauty of flavor and a delicacy of bouquet which is said to excel the best Sherry wines of Europe," and that the plant cannot fail "to be a great source of wealth to the country, if it receives any of cultivation." Some of those who have tried the wine say that it is a cross between strong Madeira and Sherry, with the best qualities of each.

WISE THRIFTY STEAL AND COMPROMISE.—Last week a broker's clerk in New York, named Bowen, He lost the money by fighting the tiger, that he was a defaulter to the amount of $50,000. He told to the following dialogue:

"How can you pay your defalcation amount to?

"One hundred thousand dollars."

"Got any of it?"

"Not a cent."

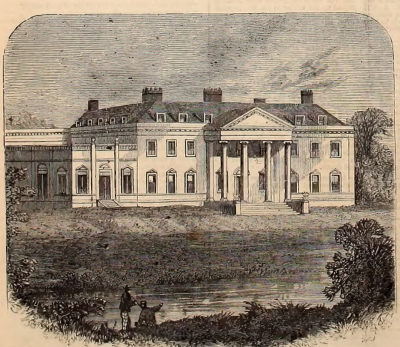
"That's bad; you have left nothing to work with?

"What must be done?"

"Compromise by your desk and abstract another hundred thousand."

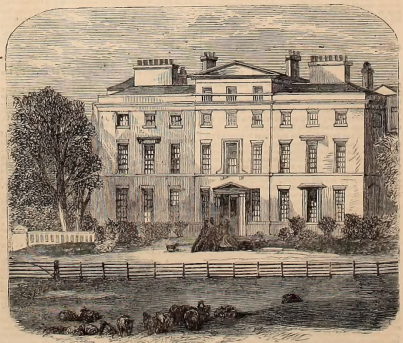
"Where can I get that for?"

"To preserve your character, and save you from going to State Prison. Write to your friends and tell them dollars you are to steal to-morrow, I intend to compromise at 50 cents on the dollar. Your creditor to-morrow will amount to $200,000. I will call at 10 o'clock, and I will compromise for $100,000, and invest myself on your heart-broken uncle, 'honest but poor.' You will be released from your confinement. The bank will accept. This will leave $50,000 to divide between you and me, and I will give you $20,000 apiece. With this sum you can retire from business.



The young man listened and took wisdom. He doubled the amount of his defalcation, and then he prayed said he should. He is now worth $200,000, and is considered one of the most respectable merchants in the city of New York.

"Pat you are only a young mulatto run away from the plantation of Mr. Charles Andrews, a sugar planter in Cuba. As, sirrah, himself was a piece of property worth a thousand dollars. The black boy answered that he knew it very well. A few days ago he went back to his old home, and found his wife living with her master, by whom she had two husbands and fugitive slave laws as if he was a white man, with money and friends, and confronted the fraud folks, and settled them handsomely, and presented a second wife and piece of land to the beloved mistress, whose family had been suggered by the war.



A CLERGYMAN, who had been particularly recommended to the captain of a vessel, was sailing down the Mississippi, when the captain, in case that a storm was approaching, said to him: "Sir, you must assist me in the rolling of the vessel; you had better get down as fast as possible into the hold. As long as you hear the sailors swearing and blaspheming, you may be assured that there are good hopes; but if you should hear them embracing and reconciling themselves to each other, you may make up your accounts with heaven." As the storm increased, the clergyman from time to time dispatched his companion to the hatchway to see how matters went upon deck. "Alas sir," said he, returning, "all is lost. The sailors are quarreling, and I am afraid that the storm is not enough to sink the vessel." "O! I have be praised," said the clergyman, "then all is right."

THE LAST OF THE TEMPLES—THE LATE LORD PALMERSTON.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN A SHORT TIME PREVIOUS TO HIS DEATH.

BROADLANDS, NEAR ROMSEY, HANTS, THE COUNTRY SEAT AND BIRTHPLACE OF LORD PALMERSTON.

BROCKET HALL, HATFIELD, HERTS, WHERE LORD PALMERSTON DIED.

INTERIOR OF THE OFFICE OF THE MEXICAN FINANCIAL AGENCY—SUBSCRIBING FOR THE LOAN.

LORD PALMERSTON.

His Birthplace and the Place of his Death.

THE portrait of the late Lord Palmerston, which we present, is from a photograph by Messrs. Walker, of Margaret street, Cavendish Square, London, and is pronounced by Lady Palmerston and his family as excellent. His lordship had just left the dentist's, where he had a new set of teeth put in, and the consequence was the under lip does not droop as much as in ordinary photographs, but his friends say that it has made the old statesman look ten years younger than he was before.

So many extraordinary biographies have been written of Palmerston, and so much that is contradictory, that it is hard to arrive at the truth, but the following is as near as can be collated:

Lord Palmerston was probably Irish—by the mother's side. She was a Miss Mary Mee, daughter of a petty shopkeeper in Dublin, with whom his father, then a widower, fell in love, at the somewhat mature age of forty-four. Miss Mee's father may have been an Irishman, but the name is essentially English, and abounds in Nottinghamshire. The deceased Premier died childless, and was fifty-five years old when he married the widow of the fifth Earl Cowper, then the mother of five adult children, and now—if a lady's age may be told—about seventy-six years old. She was the sister of Lord Melbourne, Lord Beauvale, and a third brother, whose name we forget, all of whom died without legitimate male issue, and she succeeded to all their real and personal property. Hence, since his marriage, Lord Palmerston, backed up by his wife's vast wealth, was more independent than he ever before had been.

Broadlands, his birthplace and the home of his fathers—the home where he liked best to enjoy such holidays as the cares and labors of public business would allow—first claims our notice. The Engraving gives a view of this mansion, which was Lord Palmerston's own country seat. It is a little beyond a mile outside of the Hampshire market town of Romsey, and about seven miles from Southampton. Romsey, a municipal borough, with a population of 5,000, is situated in the midst of a fertile agricultural country, watered by the river Test, which thence flows on to the head of Southampton Water, and merges at Southampton with the Itchen, from Winchester, these two rivers supplying the noble estuary with the fresh water drainage of the whole county southwards of the chalk downs. The estate of Broadlands, which for two centuries belonged to the family of St. Barbe, one of whom represented the division of the county in Cromwell's Parliament, came into the possession of Lord Palmerston's grandfather about the middle of the last century. Its boundary approaches close to the town of Romsey, on the Southampton road, the park, which is pretty large, extending about a mile and a quarter, and occupying both banks of the river Test. The valley is in some parts richly wooded, here spreading into wide meadows or lawns, and there bounded by fair green hills, on the summit of which are the traces of an ancient British fortification. The park is well ornamented with wood and water, having many stately trees grouped with much taste and judgment over its surface; while the river, which is here beautifully limpid and clear, abounding with trout, forms a most agreeable object. The house itself, as shown in our Illustration, is of simple but elegant architecture, with an Ionic portico fronting the west.

Brocket Hall, in Hertfordshire, where he died, was the family mansion of the late Lord Melbourne, and Lady Palmerston was born there. Lord Palmerston, as a peer, was comparatively poor. His English property never yielded him more than £4,000 a year, and his Irish estates in Sligo, were unproductive until about 1830, when, by the drainage of bogs and improved agriculture, they began to pay. At most, however, they never realized a net income of £1,000 a year. Palmerston's only brother, Sir William Temple, who had been British Ambassador to Naples, died in 1856, aged sixty-eight, but never had much more than his salary to live upon. There were two sisters—Frances Temple, who died in 1838, married Admiral Bowles, and Elizabeth Temple, who died in 1857, was the wife of Lawrence Sullivan, sworn in as a member of the Privy Council in 1851, when he retired from the office of deputy-Secretary at War, which he had held for thirty-five years. We have no means of ascertaining whether Mrs. Bowles or Mrs. Sullivan left any children. If they did, Palmerston would have been their uncle, and most probably, the succession to his family estates would have been theirs.

BURNING OF ST. GEORGE'S C. U. H., SEVENTEENTH STREET, NEW YORK, ON THE AFTERNOON OF NOVEMBER 14.

THE BURNING OF ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH.

No visitor to New York can forget the noble church of St. George's, Dr. Tyng's, that stood on the corner of Rutherford Place and 16th street, rearing its double steeples to the sky. It is now a pile of stately ruins, still with the double steeples towering into the sky, and its brown stone walls ghastly and staring.

The fire originated from the working of plumbers on the roof, and was first discovered about two o'clock on the afternoon of the 14th inst. The sexton was in the building at the time, and immediately gave the alarm.

So soon as it was known that the church was on fire the greatest excitement prevailed in the neighborhood. Apart from the excitement generally consequent on a fire, the uncommon fact of its being a sacred edifice which was attacked by the flames heightened the feeling considerably. The parishioners and pewholders flocked to the neighborhood of the church in large numbers, and, obtaining an entrance, strove to save some of the church furniture, and did succeed in removing about half of it, when the progress of the flames prevented further effort. Then they betook themselves to the square and watched with painful interest the advance of the fiery element as, wreathing about the magnificent spires and shooting their forked tongues through the stained glass windows, the flames threatened each moment to lay the splendid edifice in ruins. Dr. Tyng, who has for the last 17 years been pastor of the church, with tearful eyes watched the demolition of what, from length of service, he had learned to think his own especial property. And then as the streams of water from the various engines were directed on the building all the ever varying emotions of hope and fear alternately filled the breasts of the spectators. An effort was made as soon as possible after the outbreak of the fire to save the marble bust of Dr. Milnor, the first pastor of the old church in Beekman street, which was situated in the chancel; but the attempt proved ineffectual. The silver plate and communion service was thought to be stowed in the vestry, but on inquiry it was found to be safe in Dr. Tyng's house. During the conflagration the Third avenue cars were unable to pass through the crowd of engines between 16th and 17th streets, and care had to be sent from the depot to start from the end of the block. The engines were kept playing on the ruins till an early hour on Wednesday morning, in order to save the wall from general ruin. As the flames curled round the spires a little after the outbreak of the fire the two clocks stopped at five minutes to three o'clock exactly.

The church cost $205,000 to erect, the organ cost $10,000, while one stained glass window cost $2,000, altogether the building and contents cost $300,000. It was insured for only $75,000.

DEATH RIDES ON THE EASTERN WIND.

BY J. W. WATSON.

From the gates of Teheran, from Ispahan's walls,
Like a king from a mouldering throne,
The terrible sound of his footstep falls
Through the Tartar tent, and the Persian halls,
And the Orient echoes back the calls
Of the monarch claiming his own.

With his ghastly spear up-raised to the sky,
At the sullen whirr of his wing,
The nations despair, as he hurries him by,
For however they wrestle, however they fly,
The richest and poorest must surely die
In the path of the spectral king.

In vain are the edicts of earthly kings,
In vain are the sword and the spear,
The wave of his weapon a pestilence flings,
And a merciless poison distills from his wings,
Till even the savage, as death dirge sings,
Wherever his minions appear.

In his train come as servitors, cringing and base,
Intemperance, gluttony, crime,
Who follow the king with a staggering pace,
Who sing of their deeds with a brazen face,
And scatter their ruin on every race,
To the chant of their horrible rhyme.

From the glut of the kennels, the mould of the walls,
From the rime of the breath stifling drain;
The voice of the king in his majesty calls
The spirits of death, in their shadowless halls,
From each den where the light of the day never falls,
To join in his pestilent train.

From the stagnant miasma that lives in decay,
From the poisonous breath of the swamp,
From the vermin cursed dwelling that lies by the way,
From the prison and vault where the green lizards play,
He gathers the ministers day by day,
To add to his kingly pomp.

Though fierce on his path roll the bottomless seas,
For a thousand miles between,
Though a million be pleading afar on its knees,
The hands that are lifted he scorns, if he sees,
And he sweeps on his path with the seaward breeze,
Till they never more are seen.

From the Arctic sea to the torrid zone,
He reigns as a king supreme.
All climes, all nations, all lands are his own,
His sceptre of power is a shroud or a groan,
And the earth is a desert when once he has flown,
And his memory only a dream.

Hail, king of the world, from the eastern shore!
Hail, monarch in ghastliness dressed!
Our gold has been drenched with the unholy gore
Must we yield to thy clutch a beastomb more,
Ere the cry of the blood chastened land shall be o'er,
And we sink into peaceful rest?

The Secret of the Siren.

A SKETCH—IN TWO PARTS.

BY CHARLES D. GARDETTE.

PART I.—CHAPTER I.

HAVE you ever met a former schoolmate, unexpectedly, for the first time after many years, when you had both grown out into the world and mutual forgetfulness?

If you have, have you not felt a sudden glow, a warmth about the heart, an expansion of kindliness that prompted you to greet him with exhavragant joy, to clasp his hand again and again, almost to weep as you gazed upon him, and called him by the old familiar "Tom," or "Jack"?

Ay! even though in the boy-days you never liked him, though he was the cock bully, the bully, or the "mean-fellow" of the school; still, meeting him thus—the man—in the after years, your heart has gone out to him, irresistably out to him, and you have asked him of his life, since the old time, with an earnestness of curious sympathy that you would, perhaps, have scarcely exhibited towards a returned kinsman.

Such were my feelings and such my conduct towards Hall Fennor, when I came upon him, by the strangest of chances, in the railway station at Baltimore, a fortnight ago.

I say, "came upon him," but, in point of fact, it was he who came upon, or "over me," like a summer, &c.; for I should never have recognized, in the swarthy and bearded man, the pudgy, moonfaced "Pud" Fennor of school-day memory.

I was standing on the car platform—the train being on the eve of starting for Washington. A large, dark-skinned gentleman, "boarded like the pard" (whatever that excessively metaphoric animal may be), got in, or rather was about to get in, but stopped, looked again at me, and exclaimed:

"If you're not Fred Burke, I'm a blind man!"

"My name is certainly Frederick Burke, sir, but I really cannot a——"

Just then he held out his left hand, and pointing with the other to a long red line on the back of it, he exclaimed:

"What! don't you recollect the compasses?"

In an instant, my mind's eye traversed the fifteen years that separated me from the Fairhill school-days, and I saw myself—a puny, irritable urchin, bantered beyond endurance by a great lubberly companion—snatching up a pair of compasses from my desk, rushing wildly at him, and inflicting a severe wound with that dangerous weapon upon the hand he held forth to defend himself.

"Pud Fennor!" I cried, seizing his hand and wringing it heartily.

"Fred Fennor, in the flesh!" said he. "You have hardly changed, Fred; I knew you at once."

"I can't return the very doubtful compliment, Phil; but we are odd; come in, and take a seat." And we entered the car and sat down together.

After what the French call the first épanchements were over—"How came you to turn up just here, Phil?" I asked. "Do you live in Baltimore, or Washington?"

"In neither: I am just from Europe, and am going to the National Capital to meet—by-the-bye, old fellow, are you married?"

"Not much! Are you?"

"Rather! I am going to meet my wife in Washington."

"She wasn't abroad with you, then?"

"No. I only went on a hurried business trip of a couple of months."

"And—apropos, you didn't get all that tan in two months of Europe, did you?"

"Oh, no! I've been living in Brazil for some years."

"Ah! is your wife a Brazilian?"

"No! I've been engaged in the great Don Pedro railway."

"Well! Hang it, Fennor! I hate to pump you by yerks this way. We've you see I pant you to tell me all about yourself? what you've been about these fifteen years? Who you married, and when, and why, and all the rest?"

"And you—what of yourself?"

"Oh! very little worth telling. But you give me your biography first, and then I'll sketch you my eventless history in a dozen words."

"Agreed! But I can't be as brief as you promise to be, for I've a good deal to relate or two things that seem interesting and curious—to me, at least—in my experience."

"Go ahead, then. We've from here to Washington, a good hour and a half yet, and if that isn't enough, you shall wind up over a quiet bottle of Catawba and a cigar, at Willard's."

"Oh! I shall not make it over the railroad time, I hope. At any rate, here goes:

I left Fairhill school in 'forty-seven, as you may remember, entered college—a Sophomore—graduated in fifty, at twenty years of age, and went home to study a profession.

While making up my mind what profession to choose, my health became somewhat shaky, owing to too rapid growth, I believe, and my uncle, with whom I lived, advised me to take a trip South, see the country, and amuse myself for a few months.

I accordingly left home, just three months before reaching my majority, and travelled by sea to Havana, from there to New Orleans, and thence up the Mississippi, stopping a few days here and there, until I reached St. Louis, where I purposed spending a couple of months. Up to the period of my arrival in that city, nothing had chanced to me beyond the usual commonplace incidents of travel. My health had greatly improved, and I determined, therefore, to enjoy myself with all the freedom that my age, my verdancy, and my attendent temperament, combined with a pretty heavily filled purse, permitted.

I accordingly put up at the most fashionable hotel, hired a neat horse and buggy, bought the most expensive wines at dinner, and so forth.

Of course I soon made acquaintance with several of the permanent guests of the hotel, who rode, drank and smoked with me, and I with them, and who initiated me into other phases of what is, by a misnomer and heterogenous class of persons, termed life.

Among others, and the one of all others to whom I owe the greatest and most questionable boon, was a youngish man, of remarkably agreeable, solid appearance and entertaining conversation, as well as of prepossessing appearance, by the name of Glayden. At least that was the name under which he was universally known at the time, and the only one I ever heard him called. But I have reason to believe he has figured under many aliases in his day, and may flourish even now, somewhere, by a totally different title.

Glayden interested me, then, and the acquaintance speedily ripened into intimacy. I can't say that he made any special advances. He never forced himself upon me, apparently, toward any one. But he knew his game, and played it cool.

Among other scenes where life is supposed to be on exhibition, the gambling house was not omitted in my list of visits. I went more than once, more than once, with various acquaintances, and occasionally with Glayden. I never bet heavily; but I had not the nerve, nor, indeed, was my making a fool of myself, possessed himself of my purse, and finally of my person, without other exertion than a few pleasantly bitter words and a quick offering of his arm, to walk home together. The morning after the second and last of these occasions, as we were breakfasting together, Glayden said to me—

"Fennor, my dear fellow, you will never make a sporting man. You have no nerve against chance when you are sober, and when you drink, you would shut your eyes and bet your shirt, after losing every other garment on your back. As long as you keep perfectly sober you may frequent the 'tiger' without fear. You'll never ruin yourself. Therefore, you must promise me that you will never drink anything stronger than claret, when you are gambling or intend to gamble."

"Why not promise you not to gamble at all?" I asked.

"Because you would not keep that promise, I am sure, while I feel sure I believe you may. So it's agreed! nothing but claret!"

And I mechanically answered, "I promise it!"

This was within a week of my projected departure from St. Louis. My money having run rather low, and my uncle having a pecuniary commission of some value to transact with him in New Orleans, whither I proposed returning, I awaited his advices.

The second day after, they arrived in the shape of a letter containing two drafts, one of $600 on a St. Louis bank, for my personal use, and another on a New Orleans firm for $5,500, to settle my uncle's business.

I opened the letter at breakfast, and showing the drafts to Glayden said:

"I am all right, you see, now, and must positively leave day after to-morrow."

"I have half a mind to go as far as Orleans with you," replied Glayden, musingly.

"I wish you would."

He made no answer, and the conversation dropt. But that evening, when playing I drew my $600. At dinner (we dined, five or six of us, at a small table by ourselves generally) it being the last day but one of my stay, congratulations were all disposed to toast me rather more than usual, and we drank quite as much champagne as was good for us.

The conversation was of the desultory and effervescent nature usual under the circumstances.

"Glayden," drawled our host, an elderly man, with whom I was least acquainted of any, as he only dined with us, and not every day, but who seemed to know Glayden well, "Glayden, did you ever see the female tiger?"

"Female tiger? Yes, I think I have seen one or more at the menageries. Why?"

"Pshaw! I mean a biped, my boy, I said the female tiger."

"I don't understand you," said Glayden, calmly.

"Nor I:" "Nor I;" "Nor I," cried we all. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that there is in this city a 'faro bank,' the dealer whereof is said to be a lovely female. You need not grin. I repeat, a really beautiful, fascinating widow and young girl, who charms all the money out of your pockets, the hearts out of your bosoms, and wins the love of—"

"Where? where?" "Don't believe a word of it!" "Show us the siren!" "Instanter!" and other similar exclamations broke from all sides.

"I have no objection," answered the elderly gentleman; "but it is dangerous. I warn you, you'll all be victimized."

"So much the better. Anything for a change. Come on."

"Not yet. It is only half past eight. It would not be polite to call before half after nine or ten."

"Well, then, we'll finish our wine, and walk through a cigar afterward."

And all hastily consenting to agree in this arrangement, we resumed our conviviality. Half an hour later, the wine being honored, we sallied forth for a promenade and a cigar.

"By-the-bye, what is the style of this lady tiger?" asked one of the party.

"I don't know," replied the elderly gentleman.

"What! Have you not seen her?"

"Never."

"Have you not been to her 'cave.'"

"Never."

"Then how do you know——"

"I know the fact of her existence from an acquaintance of mine, by the name of Glayden. He only told me this morning. I know the street wherein she dwells, and the appearance of her front door, as described by my friend. But nothing further, no number, no address. He knew neither himself."

"How on earth will you find it then?"

"Easily. The house is in a very peculiar one. It is painted jet black, with a strong white line around each of the four panels, and stands in a small court-yard, back from the street."

"Capital!" "Very mysterious!" "Quite romantic!"

"It's a quarter to ten. Let us go."

At this juncture, Glayden, who had all the time maintained a calm silence, save an occasional "Indeed!" "Ah!" "Possible!" "Probably a humbug," or some such curt remark, spoke.

"Gentlemen," said he, "Fennor and I wish you good luck, but, unfortunately, we have another engagement, you will——"

"But," interrupted I, "I do——"

Glayden squeezed my arm, and whispered rapidly: "You have forgotten nothing; remember your promise." Then aloud to the rest again: "You will miss your adventures to-morrow morning, and if they prove tempting, Fennor and I will brave the siren to-morrow night. Good-evening." And he led me quietly in the opposite direction.

In ten minutes we were once more at the hotel.

But though I had accompanied him unresistingly, I was by no means satisfied with this arrangement. I had drank just enough wine to rouse my will to a certain point, and, above all, to inflame my desire of pursuing this adventure of the siren, as they called her, whether Glayden would or not. I felt, however, that I was not quite vinous enough for determined rebellion, or in other words, I had still self-possession enough left to feel that Glayden was right, and I accordingly resolved to have another bottle.

"Glayden," said I, "as you won't let me go to see the female tiger, and I believe you're right, suppose we go upstairs and have some supper?"

"Agreed!"

Up we went, sat down at a table, and called for the ingredients of a cold supper. I had not the least appetite; so, after picking at a cold quail a moment:

"What will you drink?" I asked.

"Nothing," answered Glayden. "Yes, I will: I'll take coffee, and I advise you to take some, too."

"No, thank you. I'm going to have a bottle of 'Mumm.'"

"Better not, Fennor. You won't sleep."

"Won't I! Waiter, bring a bottle of 'Mumm' and ice."

The wine was brought. Glayden refused to touch it, and stuck to his black coffee. I rapidly emptied the bottle, and my courage (excuse my profaning the word, but honesty having now obtained the "sticking point," I said, suddenly:

"See here, Glayden, it's all nonsense in your preventing my going to that place with the others. Do you think I'm such a fool as not to be able to take care of myself? I'm going now; it's only eleven o'clock."

"If you do, you break your promise, and will make an egregious fool of yourself. You are decidedly unfit to take care of yourself, and I shall not countenance your throwing your money away under such circumstances."

"I didn't know you were my guardian," sneered I, my devil now fairly up. "Nobody wants your countenance. I shall go, and go alone; and tomorrow morning I'll have a word to say to you, too, about your trying to—to——. You take unwarrantable liberties with me——"

"Why, my dear fellow," began Glayden, quietly. "If you are bent upon folly, and worse, I have nothing more to say. In your present state it is useless to reason with you. I trust to see you sadder and wiser to-morrow. Good night."

And he calmly walked out of the room. In another moment I had seized my hat and overcoat, and was on my way to the "Siren's."

As I passed the office I paused.

"Did Mr. Glayden go out?" I asked.

"No, sir; he this instant took his key to go to bed."

"Then he's all safe," I thought, "and I am free."

CHAPTER II.

I VERY SOON reached the street, and after a walk of a few squares discovered, without much difficulty, the black door, with its white lines, at the bottom of a small, square courtyard. So intent upon my adventure had I been that I entirely failed to note how far I had come, and between what crossstreets this house was situated. Had I done so, perhaps I might, however, I entered the court, and seeing neither bell nor knocker, caught hold of the door knob, which instantly turned in my hand, much to my surprise, and the door fell slowly back to my push.

I found myself in a corridor perfectly dark, save where a bright illumination seemed to come round a corner. Following this, I came to an angle, turned it, and saw a small hanging lamp in front of a door to the right hand. From this I also heard voices faintly proceeding, and walking resolutely, though not very steadily, I fear, for the wine was working progressively in my brain, forward, I laid my hand on the handle, with the same result as before. The door opened, and I found myself in a small, handsomely furnished room, brilliantly lighted by a gas chandelier and brackets, with heavy curtains completely hiding what I supposed were windows, lounges, arm-chairs, a sideboard, a full-length mirror of plate, and a fireplace with a bright wood fire in it.

In front of, and about six feet from, this fireplace, stood a female, and around it sat five persons, including the dealer. So instantly and vividly, however, was my gaze fascinated by the appearance of the latter, that I could note the least note of the countenances of the others who were grouped around her. Yes, her; for the person who occupied the elaborately cushioned easy-chair, directly opposite the door of entrance, was a female. As I looked upon her in the brilliant glare of the gas light, surrounded by the rose-colored drapery of the curtains, and "brought out," to use a technical term, by the dark background of the mirror behind which that chair in which she sat, I thought she was the most beautiful creature I had ever beheld.

She did not seem over sixteen. Her hair was of the true golden, the ordonat of Murillo's "Virgins:" her face fair, and bright with smiles; her eyes a blue so rich as to seem opaque; and her eyebrows much darker than her hair, and remarkably well defined.

I stood as if petrified. She burst into a delicious laugh.

"Come in, sir," said she, with a slight foreign accent, that lent an additional charm, I thought, to her voice. "I don't frighten you, I hope."

What I answered I know not. In fact, it is strange that, while I distinctly recollected afterward, and can recall at every word I write, as we will continue to call her, said to me that night, I never could recall a single word spoken there by myself, or by any, or anything said by any of the others present.

"Though you are a stranger," said she (I must have excused myself as a stranger), "permit me," you are very welcome—that is," she added gaily, and with a smile that stripped the remark of its severity, "as welcome, if you have plenty of money."

I replied by drawing forth my purse, and she nodded, with a laugh, and said:

"Come, then, and take the seat of honor, at my right hand."

I obeyed her, and passing the cards swiftly through her delicate fingers, the game went on.

My brain, which had momentarily cleared under the influence of the scene and the siren, now began to cloud again, and I felt an inordinate desire for a cooling drink. I at last half approached the sideboard.

The siren touched a hand-bell, and a bright mulatto woman, with a still brighter yellow handkerchief, turban-wise, round her head, appeared.

"Fill for the gentleman and myself," said the siren. "Come, sit down, sir; I never allow my guests to help themselves."

The mulatto brought two foaming goblets of champagne upon a salver. I cannot imagine what prompted me to the thought at that moment, but I did, at that instant, remember my promise to Glayden, and though it was but an useless precaution then, after all the "Mumm" I had drank, I murmured:

"Iced claret."

"Claret, sir—certainly. Do you hear? the gentleman prefers claret."

The claret was instantly handed me.

"To my good fortune, sir," exclaimed the siren, holding forth her glass gaily, to clink mine.

I drank it to the last drop, for it was delightfully cool and refreshing to my heated throat. The game proceeded. I bet wildly, and won! Wilder, and won again, and again! The siren touched the little bell.

"The gentleman will return my toast," said she to the reappearing mulatto.

Another goblet of claret to me, another of champagne to her.

"To your good fortune," cried she, with an espiégle laugh.

Again I did her and the claret justice. The game proceeded. I bet and lost! Bet more heavily and lost! Bet my last dollar and lost!

This time it was I who touched the bell. My brain seethed, and the figures on the cards danced and quivered before my eyes. I knew that it was an illusion, and strove, by a steady gaze, to dispel it. In vain. Then I fixed my eyes on the siren, she smiled like an angel.

"What will you have—more claret?" she asked.

Mind you, I was not intoxicated in the usual sense of the word—I was dual! Did you ever dream a dream, and then, still sleeping, dream that your first dream was all a dream, but that you were then awake, and finally awake and find that both had been visions?

When the mulatto handed me the third goblet of claret, I drank it in the first state, then in the second state, saw that I had not drank it, and so, drank it; finally awakened (though at no time as yet asleep), beheld the goblet still full before me, and actually then drained it to the last drop.

There was a ringing in my ears, such as they say drowning men have; flashes of light in my eyes; a sharp pain shooting like a meteor across my brain, and—oblivion! But in the instant preceding total night, I was conscious of one bending over me, and I saw, as you might see a face pass over a darkened mirror, the face of Glayden, and I heard, as you might hear a voice far off at sea, the voice of Glayden, saying:

"Who would have thought he could have taken three glasses?"

When I came to my senses, and opened my eyes, I was lying in my own bed at the hotel. A horrible dull, beating pain hammered upon my temples, my lips were dry and burning, and I felt deadly sick. In a little while I recovered sufficiently to ring the bell. The servant came.

"Conrad," said I (he was a German, and a very intelligent fellow), "when did I come in last night?"

"About two o'clock, I should think, sir."

"Was any one with me?"

"Mr. Glayden, sir."

"Was anything the matter with me?"

Conrad hesitated.

"You won't offend me, speak out."

"Well, sir, you were completely overcome, it's the truth, and Mr. Glayden and I carried you up. No one saw you, sir, not a living soul, indeed, sir; we took care of that, sir."

"Where is Mr. Glayden?"

"In his room, sir, I suppose. I've not seen him this morning."

"What time is it?"

"Twelve o'clock, sir."

"Bring me a flask of seltzer, Conrad, and tell Mr. Glayden I should like to see him."

While Conrad was gone, I thought, my memory came slowly back to me. Little by little, through the dull throbs of pain, it came back, and I recalled every circumstance of the last night's strange adventure. Above all, I remembered with peculiar distinctness, the face and the voice, seen and heard, in the instant before I sunk into total insensibility. With peculiar distinctness that face and that voice came back to me as Glayden's.

"Here is the seltzer, sir," said Conrad, returning. "Mr. Glayden is not in his room, but here is a note to you, sir, I found on his table. "His room looks, sir, as if he had gone away, for I don't see his baggage. It's very strange I didn't see him go," added Conrad, shaking his head.

"Gone! gone! did you say?" I cried, springing up in bed. "It can't be! Run to the office and see."

Conrad disappeared, and I eagerly opened the note. "Here it is, I've kept it ever since." And Fennor took it from his memorandum-book, and handed it to me. It was as follows:

"TUESDAY MORNING.—MY DEAR FENNOR—A most unexpected affair calls me suddenly away this morning. Knowing your condition, I don't disturb you. Perhaps we shall meet again in New Orleans, or elsewhere, though I doubt it. I shall consider that you have apologized this morning for your rudeness last night, as I am sure you are both sadder and wiser now. And I feel confident you sincerely wish you had taken my advice and kept your promise. Good-bye. Yours hastily,
"GLAYDEN."

"He has gone! I am sure it was he! He is a d—— villain!" I muttered, sinking back on my pillow.

"Yes, sir," said Conrad, "Mr. Glayden has gone. He was called away by a message that came up on the night-boat, and had just time to pack and be off by six o'clock, sir. I did not see him, because my watch was out, and I had just laid down."

"Which way did he go?"

"Down river, sir. Anything else, sir?"

"No—yes. Are the gentlemen who usually dine with me, any of them down stairs? If so, ask them, or any of them, to come up."

In a few minutes two of my acquaintances appeared.

"Hallo! Fennor. What's the matter? Too much champagne, eh? It's lucky you didn't go after the siren with us, my boy."

"Ah! Why so?"

"Perfect wild-goose chase. No such door in the street. Old Manning trotted us up and down for two hours. His friend regularly took him in. So, in revenge, we went into '25,' and made fools of ourselves, by drinking an ocean of bad champagne, and eating a covy of half-cooked quails."

"No such door? But there is, or was, such a door, I swear to you! Listen."

And I told them what I have told you. As you may suppose they were considerably startled, and even somewhat incredulous. But I showed them Glayden's note, and then they both advised instant application to the police.

"It is my intention," said I, rising, and proceeding to a rapid toilet. "Wait for me down-stairs."

But the worst was to come.

In dressing, I looked for my watch. It was missing, with its chain, both very valuable. This caused me to search my pockets. My money, with the exception of a few loose dollars, was also gone; but far worse than all, my uncle's draft on New Orleans for five thousand five hundred dollars, had disappeared with the rest!

In an amazingly short space of time I was at the police office, and had given all the information in my power. They promised to set instantly about ferreting out the affair, and, as the first step, requested me to accompany an officer to the scene of the drama, and point out the door of the "siren's" retreat.

They also promised to follow Glayden up; but the telegraph was not then as complete in its connection, by a great many hundred miles, as it is now, and especially, there was none from St. Louis to New Orleans, where I felt sure Glayden had gone, and where I resolved to follow him immediately.

We walked to the street so often referred to. We went slowly and searchingly through its entire length, which was less than a mile; we examined every door, every court, everything; we even searched a number of houses whose entrances resembled that of the fatal siren's. In vain! Not a trace of her, or of her accursed den was to be found!

After several hours fruitlessly spent, I left that part of the business in the hands of the authorities, and giving my address in New Orleans, in case it should be necessary for me to return, I quitted St. Louis by an afternoon boat express for the Crescent City. A detective went in the same boat, on the same errand.

We both arrived too late.

Glayden had reached there, ahead; forged my indorsement, got the money, and within twelve hours of our arrival, sailed in the Havana steamer for Cuba, and parts unknown.

The detective, encouraged by my offer of a thousand dollars reward, made an attempt to head him off at the Balize, but in vain! He proposed following him to Havana, but no steamer sailed for thirty-six hours, and Glayden was not a man to be caught, with that start. I, very reluctantly and sadly, gave him up.

In what a frame of mind I wrote my uncle, you may imagine. How utterly self-disgusted and miserable I felt when waiting his reply, you may also, perhaps, form an idea.

But how kind, how generous, how forgiving, how encouraging was that reply, when it did come, it is beyond your power to conceive. I returned home, in good sooth "a sadder and a wiser man!"

As Fennor uttered these last words, we shot into the station at Washington.

"Very extraordinary, no doubt," said I; "but is that all? Did you never hear of, or see Glayden again? or the 'siren' (as you call her, though to me, she seems like a hag of Endor, rather)? And you have not told me about your marriage."

"Glayden," answered Fennor, as we left the car, "I have never seen nor heard of since. As to the siren, and my marriage, there is a tale to tell, which is, perhaps, as strange as the one I have just told you, though of a much less melodramatic character."

"Is there?" cried I. "Well, then, you shall finish it, as I said, over a bottle and cigar at Willard's, this very night."

"Not to-night, Fred," said my old schoolmate, kindly. "To-night must be given to my dear wife and little ones—as well as to you, old fellow," added he; "for you shall join us; and indeed you will appreciate the second part of my story much better after having seen and known Cora."

"But when shall I hear this 'part second?'"

"When do you leave here?"

"On Saturday."

"And this is Tuesday. Well, on Saturday, if Cora is willing, we will all go northward together, and as I have given you the 'siren' from Baltimore to Washington, I will even give you the sequel from Washington to Baltimore. Come along!"

And seizing my arm he dragged me into a carriage, poo-pooh'd my remonstrances about traveling dress, dust, &c., and wound up by ordering the coachman to drive to "Willard's Hotel."

"Oh! then Mrs. Fennor's at Willard's, too, is she?"

"Of course she is, and you can dress yourself as gorgeously as you like, before presenting your majestic person to her."

The carriage drove off.

THE question is discussed in some of the Missouri papers, whether raising hemp is a good business. A much better business than being raised by it.

FIELD SPORTS OF NEW YORK.

OUR front page illustration tells its own story, but there is one point that may not be comprehensive to readers in other cities, who are also suffering under street car-ism. That point is that New York with her hundred lines of street cars, has some belonging to opposition companies running laterally upon the same street. The Bowery, as an instance, runs several lines, and has within a year or two equaled Broadway in the fabled difficulty of its passage, to say nothing of that where the unfortunate pedestrian is obliged to embark in one of the said cars. To do this with safety to life and limb he is obliged to be well up in his dodging, and coupled with a sharp eye, have wondrous facility in snatching at a passing object that he may swing himself aboard as the thing whizzes by.

Before the days of these lateral and opposition roads, the car-drivers were in sad danger of becoming blue moulded, their life was hum-drum, there was no excitement, save now and then the catching of some slow moving individual, some semi-blind old woman, or child, and giving them a gentle hint in the way of broken bones, or dissevered limbs, or else the crushing up of a stray wagon. But now things have altered, and the life of a car-driver is as jolly and exciting as that of the Jehu of an omnibus, with the advantage of having a large cargo to endanger, and a certainty that when a smash does occur, it will be more efficient.

There is certainly something charmingly dispelling to ennui in being one of a cargo of 75 in a car made to seat only 22, a driver smelling powerfully of whisky, and a conductor who knows his rights and will maintain them. How magnificently the crammed vehicle jumps over the joints of rails, or rolls on the switches like a ship in a heavy sea. How delightfully the driver swears to the delectation of the lady part of his load—for ladies do ride in them sometimes. How pleasantly excited the passengers become, especially those with very dirty clothes and democratic tendencies, and how they do elbow and crowd!

Believe us there are worse moments of excitement than a street car race with such a load. Hanging, for instance, or having one's leg taken off by a surgeon, or being knocked down and robbed on the highway, or being sent to the penitentiary for six months for picking pockets, or—we have done.

SUBSCRIBING FOR THE MEXICAN LOAN.

IT is pretty well known to all the world by this time that the Mexican Republican Government is in the market for a loan of $30,000,000, through its financial agents, Jno. W. Corlies & Co., No. 57 Broadway.

To accomplish this they have issued bonds for $50, $100, $500 and $1,000, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent., and secured upon the public lands and revenue. Ten millions of this loan is to be negotiated at 60 per cent. of its face, immediately, which will make the interest equal to 12 per cent. per annum in gold.

The bond reads this way;

[Translation.]
UNITED STATES OF MEXICO.
STATES OF TAMAULIPAS AND SAN LUIS POTOSI.

Twenty years from October 1, 1865, for value received, the United States of Mexico and the States of Tamaulipas and San Luis Potosi will pay to ———————— or bearer, the sum of FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, with seven per centum interest per annum, payable semi-annually, on the 1st day of October and the 1st day of April, in each year, at the city of New York, United States of America, principal and interest payable in gold. For the payment of this bond the faith of the United States of Mexico is hereby pledged. Its payment is also specially guaranteed by the pledge of Fifty Millions of Dollars, in select mineral lands in the States of Tamaulipas and San Luis Potosi, of the minimum value of one hundred dollars per acre, and by five millions of select agricultural lands in the same States, of the value of from one to fifty dollars per acre. Also by the pledge of sixty per centum of all the Federal and State revenues accruing from port duties, imposts and taxes in the States named. This bond is receivable in payment of all lands and mines at minimum prices—one dollar per acre for agricultural lands, and one hundred dollars per acre for mineral lands—and of all dues in any manner payable to the said general and State Governments within the States of Tamaulipas and San Luis Potosi, and of duties at the ports of Tampico, Soto La Marina, Matamoras, Camargo, Mier, Nuevo Laredo, and such others as may be hereafter established in said States.

Dated at San Carlos, in the State of Tamaulipas, United States of Mexico, this 4th day of July, 1865.
JOSE M. J. CARVAJAL,
Governor of Tamaulipas and San Luis Potosi,
Acting for said States and the United States of Mexico.

————————,
Secretary of the Mexican Legation.
(Attest.)
JULIAN CERDA, Secretary.

Without doubt there must be strong confidence in the ultimate success of the Mexican Republic, or our cautious capitalists would not be so eagerly taking up this loan.

ROYAL SPORT.—There was once upon a time a king of Prussia who was very short-sighted, so much so that he could scarcely tell the number of the regiment that passed before him in review; but he was nevertheless a passionate sportsman, and loved to kill hares, and in good company, so that they might talk over their exploits during luncheon. He was always followed by the grand veneur, who told his short-sighted majesty after each shot what was the result, and in a grave tone, as implacable as though he were a supernumerary in a tragedy. The king fired, for instance—"What is that," said his Majesty, "which I have killed?" "A goat, your Majesty." The king fired again—"What was that?" "A horse, your Majesty." A third shot—"What was that?" "A pheasant, your Majesty." A fourth shot—"A cock, your Majesty." A fifth shot—"His Highness the Duke of Schwarzenburg, your Majesty." A sixth shot—"A man, your Majesty." A seventh shot—"A child, your Majesty." "Horrible! if it had only been another duke! But a child!" "Your Majesty, it is nothing. Here is the game, wounded behind slightly." The king put down his gun, and searched in his pockets. In the confusion he produces an order of knighthood from among the many trifles, and, at last, recovering his senses, thrust it back, seizes ten Frederick d'ors, kisses the child with all the heart of a good king and a good man, thrusts the gold into the child's hand, and goes to lunch with his friends, and to relate the capital day's sport he has had.

THE ORIGIN OF THE GAME OF DOMINO.—Amédée Ponthieu has written an elaborate article about the origin of the game of "Domino" (or, as it is often called, "Dominoes") and contends that it dates back to the sixth century. Two monks of the celebrated monastery on Monte Casino, who were confined in the jail for a trifling disobedience, invented, in order to kill the dreary hours of their imprisonment, a game with small white square pieces of chalk, into which they cut small holes, which they colored, and with which they played. Being watched by the jailer of the monastery, they commenced to sing with a loud voice the beginning of the psalm "Dixit Dominus Domino," as soon as they heard the jailer coming, and repeated these words until the dangerous man was gone. After having been released, they manufactured square pieces of wood and ivory with black holes, and sold them to other monks. Thus the game was soon spread throughout Italy.

BALDNESS.

EACH hair generally has one bulb or root by which it is nourished; when this root is destroyed by sickness, violence, or age, the hair can never grow again; this is the case when the scalp is shiny or glistening.

When the scalp is fuzzy, like the down of a very young bird, it is from debility of the hair bulbs, occasioned by severe or protracted diseases; in this case, the hair grows with increasing profusion as the health recovers. Whatever hair-wash or oil happens to be applied at this conjecture, gets the credit of a hair restorative; hence the great number of these articles, not one of the whole number being a whit more efficacious than the sprinkling of a thimblefull of ashes on the poll, except so far as they have a tendency to keep the scalp clean, which common soap and water will abundantly do; or except they have the effect to stimulate the scalp, and promote a more vigorous circulation of the blood; but it is not possible for any oil or grease to do this. To make hair grow on a shining scalp is utterly impossible. But the growth of hair may be promoted on a fuzzy scalp, because in that state the root is not dead, but lacks vigor, lacks nutriment, and new vigor can be imparted, and additional nutriment be bestowed by whatever gives activity to the circulation of the blood about the roots of the hair, and what the following application fails to do in this direction, all others will, simply because it is the most certain, the most powerful and safe hair stimulant known: Half an ounce of vinegar of cantharides, one ounce of cologne-water, one ounce of rose water; to be rubbed in with a tooth-brush gently and patiently, until the part is thoroughly wetted and smarts a little; to be repeated night and morning; if too powerful, dilute with water and use less. Age brings incurable baldness, sooner or later, to almost all; but the great object of this article is to procrastinate incurable baldness, and to prevent the premature loss or thinning of the hair; first, by avoiding the causes; second, by proper attention to promoting the growth of the hair.

The ancient Romans seldom wore anything on their head, and a case of baldness was a rare thing. Baldness is very infrequent among the Indians; their heads are habitually uncovered.

Baldness among women is very much rarer than among men. Women's baldness is about the temples, that of man on the top of the head. It may then be inferred that one cause of baldness is keeping the head covered and heated, thus excessively stimulating the hair glands by an unnatural warmth, and prematurely exhausting their power, and also preventing the evaporation and escape of that effete matter, the continued presence of which is always death, in whatever part of the system it may occur. This is effectually done by the large quantities of grease, dust, and oil, which our women plaster on the sides of the head and temples, the hair and oil, making a coating over the temples almost as impervious as india-rubber, thus choking up the roots or glands and preventing the proper blood circulation; for it is the blood which carries nutriment to the hair.

The top of the head is most profusely supplied with blood vessels, yet men grow bald there first, by keeping the head too warm; also, and chiefly, by the prevalent fashions for generations past, of wearing hard fur and silk hats, which by their pressure all around the head, forcibly detain the blood from the top of the head; there is seldom baldness below where the hat touches the head. None of the writer's playmates are known to be bald at ages from forty to sixty-five; it was the universal custom among them as boys, to wear loose woolen hats, answering to the felt hats now coming into fashion. To prevent thin hair and premature baldness, first, keep a clean scalp; second, never wear the hair on a strain, or against the direction of its growth; third, never apply anything to it but soap-suds or pure water; fourth, wear loose-fitting, soft hats; fifth, let men and children always wear their hair very short, and both men and women should brush the hair a great deal, using only a coarse comb, which should touch the scalp only in the slightest manner possible.

LIFE IN JAVA.—A traveler writes from Batavia, Island of Java:

"The Hotel des Indes, at which I am stopping—the main building, two story high, with an immense piazza in front—is connected on each side by buildings like railroad depots, three or four hundred feet long. Each suit of rooms contains room enough to make two, three, and even half a dozen ordinary rooms, such as we get at the hotels in the United States. In front and back are bath houses, fountains, flower gardens, and outhouses, for cooking and for servants, marble floor, tiled roofs, ceiling from 20 to 25 feet high, no carpets, and but few curtains. Meals are served up in about the same style as at the first-class hotels in New York. The habits of living are quite different. At daylight, coffee and tea are taken to your room; at eight, same, with light refreshments; twelve, breakfast, and at seven, dinner. Coffee and tea are always ready, day or night, same as baths. No extra charge, take them or not, as you may choose. The hotel is situated in the new or upper town, some half dozen miles from the water. It is a fair specimen of five or six others, within half a mile of each other. My hotel and grounds cover ten acres. The whole ground, like the rest of the city, is one immense forest of trees and canals.

THE HISTORY OF SODA WATER.—Soda water is simply pure water impregnated with carbonic acid gas. It is known by its agreeable, pungent taste, by its slightly exhilirating qualities, and its bubbling and scintillation. The water to be impregnated with the gas is to be placed in a strong vessel, usually made of iron or copper, called a fountain. The gas, after being passed through water to purify it, is conducted to the fountain, and after sufficient agitation in contact with the gas, at a high pressure, the water becomes impregnated, and is then what is known as soda water. The first experiments were made by Venel, in France, in 1750, and published in 1776; by Priestly, in 1768; and later by Bergmad, Black, Van Helmot, and others. The first manufactory in the world was established at Geneva, by Goose, an apothecary of that city, whose annual sales amounted to 40,000 bottles of "Eau de Salts." In 1798, his partner, Mr. Paul, founded an establishment in Paris, where were compounded not only the principal mineral waters of France, but even those of foreign countries. From this time onward, laboratories multiplied all over Europe, and the manufacture of simple agrated water is now conducted on so large a scale in all civilized countries, that a very remarkable amount of inventive talent has been successfully employed in improving the necessary apparatus.

A GREAT NATURAL CURIOSITY.—The Sentinel, published at Jacksonville, Oregon, of the 12th ultimo, says: "Several of our citizens returned last week from a visit to the Great Sunken Lake, situated in the Cascade Mountains, about seventy-five miles north-east from Jacksonville. This lake rivals the famous valley of Sinbad the Sailor. It is thought to average two thousand feet down to the water all round. The walls are almost perpendicular, running down into the water and leaving no beach. The depth of the water is unknown, and its surface is smooth and unruffled, as it lies so far below the surface of the mountain that the air currents do not affect it. Its length is estimated at twelve miles, and its breadth at ten. There is an island in the centre having trees upon it. No living man ever has, and probably never will, be able to reach the water's edge. It lies silent, still, and mysterious in the bosom of the "everlasting hills," like a huge well, scooped by the hands of the giant genii of the mountains in the unknown ages gone by, and around it the primeval forests watch and ward are keeping. The visiting party fired a rifle several times into the water, at an angle of forty-five degrees, and were able to note several seconds of time from the report of the gun until the ball struck the water. Such seems incredible, but is vouched for by some of our most reliable citizens. The lake is certainly a most remarkable curiosity.

MES FROM

THE MEMORY OF A TIME.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

THUS morning, through a mist of tears,
I looked upon thy pictured face,
And, through the vistas of the years,
It shone with all its olden grace.

I saw the lilies in thy hair,
Like snowflakes in the sunbeam's gold,
And thought how I had placed them there,
And roses in thy gentle hold.

What memories stirred me at the sight,
My heart filled with delicious pain,
And in the silence and the night,
We walked the olden ways again.

We talked of flowers, and all things sweet,
Not noting that the clover blooms
Were crushed beneath our careless feet;
Love's flowers were richer in perfume.

How sweet the memory of that eve
When, with your little hand in mine,
You spoke like wind among the leaves:
"Thine own, beloved, and thou art mine!"

My heart has sung them o'er and o'er,
Set to a melody divine,
Those words that I shall hear no more:
"Thine own, beloved, and thou art mine!"

The paths that lay together then
Have led our footsteps far apart:
Two paths for us, beloved, when
Our love has made us one in heart.

This morning, when I looked again,
Upon that face of love divine,
My heart kept whispering, through its pain,
"Thine own, beloved, and thou art mine!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—MR. ROBERTSON LOSES HIS BREAKFAST.

WHEN Anthony and Clarissa were startled by the appearance of the doctor and Mr. Robertson, Anthony, in rising rather rashly, knocked the lecture over, and the two poodles, from the different parts of the carpet to which they had been precipitated, began to bark anew. On catching sight of the doctor, they added to the dismay and embarrassment of Anthony, by going and squatting at the feet of the two amazed gentlemen at the door, and staring from them at him and Clarissa, occasionally looking up into their master's face, as if to assure him they had had no hand in the affair whatever.

"Doctor," said Anthony, "I——"

The poodles growled, and barked menacingly.

"Well sir?" remarked the doctor.

The poodles came forward, and settled themselves on their haunches, and looked at Anthony as if to say, "You have permission to speak."

"Doctor," Anthony began again, "I should like—that is, I should have profound speaking to you alone this morning, but of course, as it is, it's natural you should look for an explanation at once."

"I think so, sir," replied the doctor, icily. "Very natural, sir—hem!"

The poodles came a little nearer, and gave a short bark, as much as to say, "Come, now, no shirking;" and finding it easier to bear their angry scrutiny than the doctor's, Anthony looked at them as he began to speak.

But before he got out a single word, a hand was laid on his arm, with a gentle, assuring touch, and a voice said, "Hush!" and then he saw Clarissa move across the room.

He hardly knew how she managed to turn that indignant look in its morning splendors of frill and stud, and bouquet; but she did manage somehow, and, in a minute, he found himself alone in the room with Mr. Robertson.

This was not pleasant—not pleasant to either gentleman; but Anthony, in his happiness, would willingly have borne Mr. Robertson's share of embarrassment as well as his own, if he could have taken it from him. He did not once look at him; but he felt, as he stood at the window, that the unruly plaid, being thrown very much forward in speaking to him, as he thought of his going out of the gates in the same manner in which he had himself gone out that morning, "on the" stood out laughing on the lawn. When Anthony heard the door open he felt sure he was going, and turned round hastily.

It was the doctor who had entered, and Mr. Robertson sat still, stroking one of Clarissa's poodles.

Anthony saw that the bouquet was spoiled, and that the frill was not in such exquisite order as it had been a few minutes ago, and then he thought of the tearful face and the clinging hands—thought of them, and blessed them in his heart tenderly, which he pleaded for him; and, as for the rest—as for what was to come—he felt, as he stood looking out, with misty eyes, into the garden, he could almost say, in prayer and praise, "Thy will be done!"

"Anthony," said the doctor, stiffly, but in a rather unsteady voice, "I will speak with you presently—yes, presently; but—hem!—I feel that my first duty, after—hem!—the disclosure my daughter has just made, is to have a little conversation with this gentleman."

And the doctor bowed with an injured and air to Mr. Robertson.

Anthony hardly understood whether he was to take his leave at once, or wait till the proposed conversation should be over. He bowed also, half to the doctor, and half to Mr. Robertson, and looked perplexed. A pause followed, which Anthony interrupted by going to the chair where his hat was, and, as he stooped for it, his hand was arrested by Mr. Robertson's voice.

"Doctor," he said, "you are very kind, but I don't see that conversation between you and I just now, is of any consequence; but between you and Mr. Meade it is, of course, of great consequence; so let me walk with you good morning."

Anthony turned round, saw him drop the doctor's hand and go towards the door. He thought that he would be too proud to go without giving him a frigid bow, and he was right. As he reached the threshold he turned, looked at Anthony, and bowed. Anthony did not bow; he advanced a few steps, and then stood still. Mr. Robertson looked at him. Probably, if Anthony had held out his hand, he would have turned away full of resentment towards him. As it was, however, he saw something in the irresolute figure and troubled face that made him almost involuntarily turn back and hold out his hand to Anthony.

Anthony grasped it, not with any violent display of friendship, but with a quiet, grateful pressure and smile that suited his neighbor's feelings much better.

"But, Robertson, my dear fellow—sir—sir!" cried the doctor, wildly, as he went down the stairs, "you haven't had any breakfast!"

"Mr. Robertson," exclaimed Anthony, running down after him, "pray do stay to breakfast. I'm going in a minute, upon my word I am."

He forgot, in his eagerness, that he ought not to have presumed that they could not both sit down to breakfast; but Mr. Robertson forgave him even that, and said that he would drop in at Rook House some morning, and repay himself for the breakfast Anthony had robbed him of.

When he was gone, Anthony fled up the stairs and caught hold of the doctor's two hands.

"Doctor," he congratulated him, "and, "on having such a friend as that. You were indeed right; he is a most charming man—he is, upon my soul!"

"Ah, isn't he?" cried the poor doctor, quite taken by surprise and overpowered; "isn't he, Anthony? And to—to think, my dear boy—to think——"

"Yes, yes," exclaimed Anthony, still shaking his hands, "I know—I know, and I feel for you, I believe."

"Isn't he a perfect gentleman, Anthony?"

"He is, doctor—he is."

"And handsome, doesn't think so?" asked Anthony, almost indignantly.

But at this the doctor drew back a little, and began to scrutinize Anthony's sympathy afresh, doubtfully. By degrees an expression came into his face which made Anthony grow red, and in another minute both breakfast things were shaking with the doctor's laughter.

"Do I mean she doesn't think so?" he said at last, with tears running down his cheeks. "Poor —get along, you sly dog, and bring her in to breakfast."

CHAPTER XXXIX.—BOB GROWS IMAGINATIVE AND UNPLEASANT.

FULL three hours before the time fixed for the meeting with Bob made up his mind to encounter with extraordinary circumspection, examining every bush, looking up into every tree. Round and round he went, keeping generally out of sight from the road, but crossing it at times, until he had satisfied himself that he was alone—that Mr. Sleuth had made no "preparations" for the coming meeting. Satisfied of this, he climbed up into a tree, three his legs across a great branch, and then, sitting at his ease, and with his hands joyed content, against the trunk, and began to crack nuts.

In a little time a man, riding a donkey, and having panniers on each side, attracted Bob's attention, and though he didn't see much to mind in the appearance of the man, he looked very hard indeed at him, when he saw that the donkey had panniers, but ridden by a woman, come soon after. But both passed away, and Bob laughed at his own suspicious fancies, and cracked nuts.

Then came an old, blind man with a dog, and somehow Bob again fancied there was mischief in the wind. He had, as he supposed, settled in paper about him for which "Mister" Sleuth was willing to pay ten thousand pounds, but which was, beyond question, worth a million to his own property, if he could only get possession of it, even without paying the ten thousand. Vehemently did Bob suspect that Mr. Sleuth would yet trick him out of that pretty little sum if he didn't take care, and he was now thus mounted aloft that he might the better survey the field before descending. The murder business might or might not be a reason why Sleuth should keep to his bargain; but, at any rate, Bob didn't mean to give him a chance of arresting him, seizing the document, and then telling him to do his worst, which Bob thought to himself he would do if he were "Mister" Sleuth, "purwided, always purwided," he were not the murderer; on which point, Bob acknowledged to himself, he couldn't quite make up his mind.

Sleuth came exactly to the minute he had appointed, and looked round anxiously, but vainly for Bob. Bob saw and enjoyed the sight. Sleuth began to walk to and fro uneasily, and Bob took out a fresh handful of nuts, and cracked them even more slowly and enjoyingly than before. Presently, Sleuth's great anxiety burst from him in an exclamation, that was heard in the tree above:

"Merciful heaven! If he has gone off, after all to Anthony——"

"All right, Mister Sleuth! Hold your arms and I'll drop into them, soft as a bubby!" suddenly shouted out Bob.

Sleuth looked up, came closer, and at last could distinguish his man.

"Quick, Bob?"

"All right, Mister Sleuth! Hand up the dockement."

"No, Bob. The codicil first, if you please."

"Not if I knows it. The dockement, Mister Sleuth."

"No—no, Bob—the codicil. Of course you shall have the paper. See, here it is."

"Shan't part with it, nor come down, till I've got the dockement and given it fully an hour's consideration. So, if time be a bobject——"

"Well, Bob, the paper'll do you no good if you break faith with me. Give it to me."

"Please stick it on the end of your stick and hand it up to me."

Sleuth did as he was told, and then had to wait while Bob read and re-read the engagement; and though he boggled over particular words and phrases, and compelled Sleuth to give all sorts of explanatory comments, he was obliged to acknowledge at last it was quite right and "strong."

"Now, then!" said Sleuth, almost hoarse with anxiety, and thinking in his thought that in another moment or two he would be master of fate.

"All right, Mister Sleuth. Got five guineas about you? I'm werry hard up, and I've got to wait so long, you see, for the diskivery of that dockement."

After a moment's hesitation, Sleuth took five guineas from his pocket, wrapped them up in paper, and threw the package up to Bob, who caught it.

"Now, then, Bob, are you satisfied?"

"What's the time o' day, Mister Sleuth?"

Sleuth looked at his watch, and gave Bob the required information.

"Couldn't spare that ticker, I spose?"

"No."

"Not to a friend—not to a friend who brings you fortin?"

"Bob, is this fair?"

"Good watch, I spose?—keeps correct time? Keepsakes are beautiful things, particklerly when lovely gals gives 'em, Mister Sleuth. How I'd like to have a summut personal, to keep, you in remembrance!"

Bob, is this your last demand on me, if——"

"If you give me your own volleyed watch I'm ashamed on yer, Mister Sleuth, to ax such a question. Of course it's the last. See this?"

Bob held out a thick folded paper. Sleuth could scarcely see it—his eyes were almost covered as with a film, through his intense dread that Bob was intending to play him or him falsely.

"Talk of Aladdin and his dirty lamp, Mister Sleuth, and his big genius! Only you rub this agin your dockement, and upon me as you genii genius by letting me hear that ticker a bit close, and——"

"Here it is, then," said Sleuth, faintly, and reached up into the tree as far as he could.

Bob took the watch, put it to his ear, listened lovingly to its tick, looked down at Sleuth, again at the watch, and then put it in his pocket.

"What's that ere on your finger, Mister Sleuth? You ain't cut yourself?"

Sleuth looked and saw nothing on the hand that Bob pointed to but a sparkling ruby ring—Anthony's birth-day gift.

"I see nothing, Bob."

"That be blowed, Mister Sleuth! Let me look, if you please."

Sleuth repressed the savage yearning to do something or other, more desperate, he knew not which, and held up his hand.

"Why, there it is! A ring—a'most blood-red. What a lovely! Mister Sleuth, now, I am going to ax a favor on yer. I never was worth a ring in all my life. You'll be able to have such lots on 'em presently—rings and bracelets, and carbuncles, and what not—that you'll be ashamed on a poor blackguard like me a-coming to see you if I hadn't one bit of personal hadornment. Now, wouldn't you?"

"Bob, there's the ring." And he handed it up. "Would you like my coat, waistcoat, and trousers too? May I keep my shirt?"

Sleuth laughed in very bitterness of soul, and then Bob, too, laughed, but with the intensest enjoyment.

"Mister Sleuth, that ere princess as never spoke but out came tumbling from her mouth jewels as fast as if she was full on 'em, and it was all quite a-lick—there's a girl rid of a deal as wasn't to be compared to you. Haw! haw! haw!" After this explosion Bob seemed to relent, and then added:

"Ah, Mister Sleuth, you see we all likes our little games. You had yourn yesterday, when you wanted to fob me off with the world through a hole in my back. This is my little game to-day. Mister Sleuth, invented expressly for the occasion. But I likes you, Mr. Sleuth, werry much, arter all; so look out! This tree's a goin' to rain gold on you in a pretty awful shower. Don't you hear the guineas a-rattling—a hundred and seventy thousand of 'em just a-flying?"

And so saying, Bob dropped at last the coveted paper.

And then, to Sleuth's eyes, Bob—trees—roads—ideas of murder and of danger—all passed away. Feeling as a man in a wondrous dream feels, he ran out into the road; while Bob, on his part, fled in an opposite direction, to make sure of himself and his paper. And then, Sleuth, in the road, with shaking fingers, opened out the paper, and stood for some minutes absolutely wrapt in its perusal, for it was unquestionably the real codicil, and it gave to Sleuth all that his cousin Anthony at that moment possessed.

CHAPTER XL.—A BUSY NIGHT.

A GREAT sale over her needlework in the topmost room of a cheap lodging-house in Kensington, tired in body, still more weary in mind, but struggling on by the aid of the thin tallow candle, and drawing some relief from the faint cooling breeze stealing through her open window, and bringing powerfully, in fitful gushes of scent, the odor of a pot of mignonette, that she had bought for a penny, from a woman in the street, a day or two ago.

She is thinking of the past, for—heaven help her! the future will not bear thinking of. She is thinking of the one gleam of hope she had had through her brief acquaintance with the chemist's assistant, who had seemed to like her, and began to take her out, and then had disappeared—to become, as she had learned, a grand country gentleman.

It is nothing wonderful that she should think of him, to-night, for there have been few nights for the last few months in which she has not thought of him; but what does seem wonderful to her—and brings with a sense of awe after the first glad flush of surprise—is to see the very man she had been thinking of standing at the threshold of her door, with a bow on his face.

"Ah, Polly! is that you? I wondered if I should find you in the same place. Why, how well and handsome you look! Flourishing, eh? So glad!"

Polly's tears might have been taken for an answer, had she been seen; but she managed to hide them while putting a chair for him to sit.

"Could you make me a dozen shirts, Polly? Take your own time, you know, and materials, put your nicest work into them, and don't be afraid of the figure in the bill—I shan't."

Polly did not respond very heartily to the proposal—munificent as was its sound. Still, she needed work of a more profitable kind than that she was now engaged on, so she managed to express her thanks.

"What a nice thing it is to write such a pretty, lady-like handwriting as I see here on a letter I once received, and which I have kept, you see, and mean to go on keeping, too!"

Polly actually blushed again, as Sleuth produced a letter she had written him in their courting days.

"I don't know," she said, sadly. "When it was supposed, before the death of my father, that I was going to be a lady, people used to say I did not want to ask a favor from you, Polly."

"What is it?"

"Well, Polly, when people ask favors they should, in some degree, show they are quite willing themselves to confer favors."

"Pray, Mr. Sleuth, don't——"

"No matter, Polly—you was taken of her words; but, on the contrary, the visitor proceeded to remove from his pockets a little white paper box, and then to take off the lid, which showed a good deal of cotton wool within, and then, from the centre of the snowy bed, he drew forth a really pretty brooch, and put it on the table close to her hand.

With an almost imperceptible sigh, Polly took it up and examined it, while a faint smile—that, however, seemed only too ready to degenerate into something else—flickered over her pale, thin, but comely features.

"Real gold, and solid gold, mind you, Polly; and no nonsense about the stone—it's a prime cornelian, warranted in the lot."

Polly was so poor, so hopeless, that even the new disappointment that had so rapidly followed the new pleasure of her former lover's presence could not prevent a certain grateful feeling for the gift, which she was trying, in safe words, to express, but Sleuth stopped her.

"Now, Polly, all I want you to do for me is to copy a letter written by a woman who can't write herself, except in this ridiculous fashion."

So saying, Sleuth laid before Polly Gaston a letter that certainly exceeded in badness of penmanship everything she had ever seen before.

"I'm afraid I can't read it," she said.

Sleuth laughed.

"Just my case at first; but I managed, with the author's assistance, to spell it out word by word, and as it interested me very much, I am in no way danger of forgetting. Now don't you fancy, Polly, that because you see there's a lady in the case I am in love with her, for I am. I have a deal of trouble since we used to meet, and been obliged to think of less pleasant subjects; but I'm 'not going to tell you about such things now. I shall come and see you again before long—if you'll let me."

A little unconscious glow in the pale cheek began to be visible; but Sleuth said no more, and she sat down to her task, Sleuth repeating a sentence, or a part of a sentence, at a time, till the whole was accomplished.

Sleuth had looked over her shoulder from time to time, and had been always delighted, as he said, with the penmanship; and somehow, by his steadiness in keeping her at the work, and by cunning little bits of praise in the way of a running accompaniment, Polly was got through a task that she certainly would never have undertaken under such circumstances, if at all, if he had allowed her time to think.

"Thanks, Polly; and now good-bye. Oh! but the money for the shirts, I was forgetting all that. Take this banknote—it's for ten pounds—and let me have the very best you can provide, finest frills, and all that. Good-bye, Polly." He was passing across the threshold, after a fervent pressure of her hand, when he stopped, and said, "If you could manage to have one or two ready, just to begin with, in a week's time, I should be so glad."

Polly promised, and felt a little fluttering of her heart as she did so, that he was so soon coming again. A moment after, and he was gone; and she had fresh materials for her solitary musings.

"Splendidly done!" ejaculated Sleuth to himself, as he got into the street. "I'll go again, because I do want the shirts. Who knows how soon I ought to put on one of them, as a real gentleman's shirt, and not those things they sell in the shop. But there, I'm wasting time, and time's just the thing I can't afford to waste to-night. Is it safe?" he suddenly said to himself, in an altered tone, and his hand slid under his waistcoat, and felt against his breast, but was withdrawn in quiet satisfaction. He began now to walk rapidly through the wide streets and frequented thoroughfares that lay in his way; but whenever he came upon the end of a narrow, obscure street, he immediately dived into it, and glanced at every little shop he saw; but still he did not stop till he reached a small ironmonger's. Here he went in and purchased quite a little collection of tools, remarking as he paid for them, "I'm a bit of an amateur in carpentering, and I want to fit up a little box of tools."

Putting his parcel into a bag he carried, he started off once more on his quest, for the call at the ironmonger's was evidently a mere episode in the business of the night. At last Sleuth saw what he wanted—a jobbing man at work in a little shed-like kind of shop, making boxes for milliners.

"Can you do a little job just now?"

"What is it?" asked the man, who was an ill-tempered, sullen-looking fellow, and who looked as if the perpetual jar of his hammer had produced a morbid irritation of brain.

"I want a little box made; it's only to hold tools, but it's to fit into a bigger box I keep for all sorts of odds and ends."

"Let's look at the tools," said the man, seeing Sleuth's gesture of pointing to his bag.

"I've got the exact size here," said Sleuth, and he produced some pieces of paper. One was an oblong piece, a foot or so long, by about eight inches broad. "That's the bottom," he said to the man, "and these four strips which I have pasted together make the sides," and he raised the strips on edge, to show what he meant.

"And the top?"

"Don't want any top."

"Then it's just a drawer you want to go into a place a foot deep, eight inches wide, and two and a half inches high?"

"Exactly."

"Common deal."

"I'd like a better wood; perhaps you'll show me a bit of mahogany."

The man groped about, and found various pieces of second-hand mahogany; but Sleuth seemed very fastidious about the color and grain, and the man seemed inclined to give up the job, when Sleuth observed an antique table which had lost a leg, and become otherwise unsaleable. Sleuth went eagerly to it, pulled out a drawer, looked at it scrutinizingly, and said:

"The very thing if you can just alter it to my size!"

"Then you'll have to buy the table—five shillings."

"All right, only be as quick as you can, please; and you must make it exactly to the paper. I want it to fit nicely."

"If your paper is right my drawer shall be right."

"The paper's right to a hair's breadth. I may as well wait while you do it, so I'll go and send in a couple of glasses of brandy and water for us."

Sleuth required such extreme exactness, and made so many minute alterations, that he did not get away from the shop till nearly eleven o'clock, though the man had, as he thought, finished his job at nine. But Sleuth kept him in extraordinary good humor all the while by his talk and light-heartedness; and when they parted Sleuth gave him not only the seven shillings and sixpence demanded for the whole affair, but left him the drawerless table, by way of extra bounty.

"Capital again!" thought Sleuth to himself. "It's the very color."

And, no doubt, he knew what he was saying, for he had a sort of specimen bit of mahogany in his pocket, which he took out to compare with his drawer when he reached a narrow court, within which he could stand unnoticed, and take the benefit of a gas-lamp that hung there to light the way to a pawnbroker's back entrance.

Naturally, Sleuth needed now a little refreshment; so he went into a quiet-looking inn, and ordered supper. But a strange thing happened to the waiter who brought it in a few minutes later. He met the gentleman going out with a letter in his hand, who asked him for the nearest post, and then, giving him sixpence, said he had altered his mind, had no appetite, and so marched off.

That letter, which had been duly addressed by Polly, and sealed at the inn, he stopped to look at the moment before dropping it into the slit of the post-office window. He read on it, inscribed in the most elegant feminine hand—elegant in spite of a little weakness or tremulousness:

Dr. Pompess, Petersham, Surrey.

As it dropped with a noise that almost startled him, there was, just for an instant, a scared look on Sleuth's face, as if he felt he had committed himself to something serious; but the feeling, if real, passed away. He felt again at his breast, glanced down at the bag that held the piece of carpentry he had been so anxious to get, and cried gaily:

"Home! home!"

Two hours later, in the depth of night and darkness, he discharged the crazy hackney-coach some half mile before he reached Rock House, and then glided swiftly through meadow after meadow, far away from the road, till he reached the house. He let himself in by a key he was known to possess, and by the principal door; but he did it so softly that no one seemed to be disturbed. Sleuth did not want to be a nuisance to anybody, so he slipped off his boots before ascending the staircase, and without obtaining a light, felt his way, step by step, up the staircase, along the corridor, past the alderman's bedchamber, and so to his own room.

But not to rest. On the contrary, he had evidently, while abroad, been only preparing for the work he had to do at home. He locked his door, threw off a light overcoat he had worn, as much for concealment as for its more obvious purpose, hung the coat on a nail of the door, and so disposed of its long skirt as to shut out the key-hole view of the room, should any prying people be about. He then took forth his drawer, and took a very long and careful look at it, turning it about on all sides, as if to investigate new doubts that arose in his mind.

"No, there's no danger. First, it's a thousand—ay, a million—to one against his going to his desk at all during so short a time, for I shan't be above an hour; and if he does, it isn't likely he'd have occasion to pull out the drawer; and then, if he did go, and did pull it out, with only a candle near him, is it likely he'd notice any change?"

Sleuth answered himself by setting to work. Sticking his knife into the rim of one of the sides of his new purchase, he forced off, by splitting, a bit of the wood, and when he had got the defect to his mind, darkened the edge, evidently with a view to its greater likeness to the original that was in his mind.

Then he sat a moment, half twisted round on his chair, leaning one hand in reverie on the chair, and the other hanging down with the drawer. His courage was failing him, now that the critical moment had come.

So lost did he become in his reverie and hesitation, that when a handful of soot fell down the chimney on to the hearth, he leaped to his feet in alarm, as if some awful visitation impended.

He breathed hard, and tried to compose himself. Then he unlocked the door, and pushing it a little ajar, lay down, crouching close to the floor, and, at first, inside the room. Presently his head advanced across the threshold, and again he listened. Not a sound of any kind, except the melodious bell of a neighboring church striking two, could he hear.

He returned for his drawer, and set out on his adventure. Again was he obliged to pass the spot where he had murdered the alderman, and again was it all he could do to avoid stopping to listen at the door, for there was a ceaseless whispering at his ear, "Do, and you'll hear what you won't forget."

He hurried on, guarding himself from entangling his feet with the mats at the different doors, always feeling about for a stray chair or other article that might be lying about, and which he might upset, and so rouse the sleepers; stopping near the doors where he fancied he heard sounds, till satisfied they meant nothing special; and so he made his way to a little room that Anthony used as a study, just as the alderman had done before him.

With wonderful delicacy of touch, Sleuth, when he got into this room—always in a mess—piloted his way without the slightest noise through the dense darkness, till his hand dropped upon some object on the table. While the fingers of this hand rapidly glided down on one side, the other hand came instantly to its aid, and there was recognition of the shape and identity. It was the alderman's old-fashioned, heavy, mahogany writing-case, which Sleuth had never handled except when locked, but the interior of which he was perfectly familiar with, from seeing it so often open when he and Anthony happened to be there together.

Hark! What is that? Steps, evidently! They approach. Shall he fly? While he hesitates they recede. Then again they seem to come nearer, and again grow faint. Sleuth understands at last. It is Anthony's bed-chamber above, and it must be Anthony himself who is walking to and fro at so untimely an hour.

"Thinking of his marriage day, perhaps. Stop a bit, dear cousin! There are two of us to be consulted. March on, my brave warrior; I like to hear you just now. Never mind the mole burrowing below you." Sleuth now drew a key from his pocket, and managed, after some delay and difficulty, to open the desk, draw out the pin which confined the drawer, and then he drew forth the drawer itself, which was full of papers, and replaced it with his own. It fitted at once, and perfectly, to Sleuth's immense relief of mind.

Sleuth's fingers conveyed to their master a sense of dismay as they felt these papers, their surfaces, angles, positions, &c.; for it was indispensable to his scheme of entire safety to be sure that, if Anthony came after Sleuth during the next hour or two, he should have no suspicion that his desk had been touched. But after two or three goings over, by the fingers, of the papers, they began to remove the contents into the counterfeit drawer, which was by the side of the desk ready. In the most unbroken silence was the operation completed. No limb moved, no accidental sigh or gasp escaped. Sleuth's whole soul was concentrated on the one task, to remember accurately how he found the papers, so that he might leave them in a similar state. At last the counterfeit drawer was put into the desk, containing Anthony's papers.

When he had done this he paused, and his hand went to his forehead, as if in perplexity. The pin! He had forgotten to make a place in his drawer for the reception of the end; so, though he tried the experiment of putting it to see if the broken side would help him in any way, the head of the pin resolutely stuck up, and had to be withdrawn before he could close the desk. So he slipped the pin in among the papers in the body of the desk, saying to himself:

"If he found the pin out he'd think nothing of that, for I've seen him shut it up in the same state."

The emptied drawer was now taken up, and Sleuth retraced his steps with great rapidity, not only because time was so precious, but because he knew nothing was in his path likely to create noise.

Back again in his room, the door double locked, the key-hole guarded as before, but with much greater nicety, Sleuth ventured, for the first time since he had entered the house this night, to get a light. Clever as he was, even he could not do what had now to be done in darkness. He glanced round fearfully the moment there was light, and seemed for some little time unable or unwilling to begin operations, lest there might be unknown spectators somewhere, ready to use the opportunity he now gave.

But he was soon at work, with his tools displayed in orderly array on the table, and a thin slice of flat board that he took from the very middle of his bed, where it lay between two heavy mattresses, quite secure from the prying eyes of maid servants. He wanted to remove the entire bottom of the drawer, but saw the operation was too difficult for him in the time, so he adopted a different course. The edges of the drawer projected, he saw, nearly half an inch below the bottom. That would do. Before long, Sleuth had fitted into this space another bottom below the real bottom. The two almost touched; for that which Sleuth meant to place within them required little room. But when he had done he saw, with some dismay, that the hollow space formed by the projecting edges had all but disappeared. However, as he assured himself, it was not likely that Anthony would notice so trivial a fact, even if by any accident he happened to look at the bottom at all.

When all was ready, Sleuth, with another timorous glance round, took from his breast the paper Bob had given to him, put it between the two bottoms, and then fastened the lowermost one by very small tacks, forced into the corners with his fingers, for, as he reminded himself:

"There is no saying how quick I may have that job to do when the time comes."

Yes—when the time comes! Richard Sleuth is not fool enough to trust that paper away from his own person till the critical moment arrives. But he sees the drawer now with it in, and he sees that there is no noticeable sign of his night's work anywhere upon the drawer of Anthony's desk.

Swiftly now the codicil is restored to its place in Sleuth's breast, and the false bottom again fastened to the drawer. Swiftly Sleuth, for the second time, glides through the darkness to Anthony's room, there again transfers the papers to their former place of deposit. Swiftly he returns, breathless with agitation at his own complete success, unwatched, unsuspected by Anthony, who was still pacing to and fro in his bed-chamber, unable to sleep after his success with Clarissa and her father.

On reaching the room, the tools were carefully gathered up, and repacked with the very paper and twine used by the ironmonger; so that, if the parcel were noticed in the cupboard, it would be seen to be yet unopened.

The mock drawer, sawdust, shavings and chips were burnt; and when the place was clear, the keyhole was unplugged, the door unlocked, and even, in very ostentation of innocence, left a little ajar.

And then? Why, then, is it to be wondered at that Richard Sleuth felt, after so much work and strain, he needed a little relaxation—a little comfort? He had succeeded; not a soul was stirring in the house except Anthony, and Sleuth knew where and how he was engaged; he might safely indulge his eyes, therefore, as he was undressing, with a sight of that wonderful paper.

He takes it forth, but the letters become so many golden letters, blazing with supernatural light, they dazzle his eyes, there is magic in them. Fatigue and over-excitement are affecting his brain. He must put it away. Suddenly, by his very side, almost as if looking over his shoulder, he hears a voice that sounds to him like a sentence of death, for it is Anthony who says:

"Why, Dick, what's the matter? What have you got there?"

When Sleuth heard the voice of Anthony asking him what he had got there, he felt, the moment he had recovered from the first awful feeling of alarm, that he probably ought to avow at once it was the codicil that had just come into his hands, and bear the brunt of Anthony's surprise, disbelief, and possible fury.

But there was in Sleuth an incurable love of crooked ways, for their own sake. He never felt safe or comfortable when he was not pursuing them; and one inevitable consequence was, that if at any time he wished to diverge into the straightforward road, he found it almost impossible to do so, on account of the many influences that he had evoked, all tending to keep him going on in the old track.

So, even while he stood shaking in affright, with his back still turned towards Anthony, and his fingers huddling away into his breast the precious paper, he rejected the acknowledgment of the truth, and after a brief pause, to restore his features to something like the aspect of quiet, he turned to Anthony, and said, smiling:

"I think I never was so startled before."

"So it seems, Dick," said Anthony.

"It's—it's so late, you see."

"Yes, I know all about that; and I shouldn't have come to disturb you, but that, happening to open my door, I thought I heard you open yours; and as I very much wanted to talk to you, if you were like me, unable to rest, I thought I'd come."

"Yes, that's right—and—well, Anthony?"

"Ay, but first—well, Dick? I'm sure you were busy in that paper——"

"Paper?" said Sleuth, as if abstractedly considering, while, in truth, he was taking time to think.

"Paper, Dick! I said it plain enough, didn't I? Paper!"

There was something sharp and dissonant in Anthony's voice, as if he were really offended and surprised at Sleuth's secretiveness. What was Anthony's surprise when Sleuth, with a kind of redness spreading over his face, looked him full in the face and laughed.

Anthony did not laugh in return, he only waited.

"Why, Anthony, I didn't think you had been so curious, or—may I say it—so dull? Look there, then, and ask no more questions."

So saying, Sleuth produced a letter, and tore off the outside leaf, which was addressed to himself in a feminine hand. This was, of course, the same letter that he had—fortunately now for himself—handed up to show poor Polly Gaston in proof he had not forgotten her. As he handed this leaf to Anthony, he said:

"You won't care to see any more, I dare say."

"All right, Dick, only it's odd that just when I was thinking I ought to come and tell you something that had happened to me—something I fancied you would be pleased to hear—it did, and does, seem queer that you, apparently with the same kind of communication to make to me, stand like a man who has got the palsy, merely because you hear my voice come on you unexpectedly while you are enjoying your love-letter. Eh?"

Did Anthony disbelieve him? This was Sleuth's prompt question to himself. But he could do no more to re-assure the sceptic, if it were so. So he felt satisfied he had ventured the bold measure of giving Anthony a piece of Polly's letter, even though his first impulse after he had done it was of alarm at the possible connection he was making between himself and the anonymous epistle by so doing. But Anthony's thoughts must now be turned in another direction, so he said to him, in a hurried tone:

"I'm so glad, Anthony, it's what you say—I mean about yourself."

"Perhaps I should be able to say the same, if you gave me the chance. However, as you please, Dick. I'm sorry I disturbed you. Good-night."

"Was it possible," asked Sleuth, "he had gone in that manner, and without even shaking hands?" He sat down on a chair, with a face now once more deadly pale, and saw the crisis was coming, and that, perhaps, it was as well for he (Sleuth), to get prepared for the inevitable crash by some little preliminary stroke.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

It is a fact that Captain Cook discovered the Sandwich Islands, but it is equally true that the Sandwich Islands discovered Captain Cook-ery.

You don't know anything about scarecrows. If you'd seen one that my uncle Ben made once, you'd think so, too. Why, he made one, and set it up in his cornfield, that nearly frightened the feathers off every crow that looked at it; and, by jingo, one crow that had been pecking around the field for two or three days, after he had seen it, actually flew away and brought back all the corn he had stolen.

When the Rev. Cornelius Winter was delivering a sensible discourse to a crowded assembly, his gravity was disturbed by casting his eye to a window next the causeway in the road, by a countryman staring into the meeting with a live pig on his shoulder, that also presented its vacant countenance and appeared equally interested in the gaze with its master. The amiable divine said, "That nothing in his whole life ever so unhinged his ideas, or spoiled his discourse, as this serious, but ludicrous and unconscious man and his pig."

It is afterwards examined, and if there is a shot that didn't go in the bung-hole, the member who missed it is expelled. I belonged to the company ten years, and there ain't been nobody expelled yet."

THE FENIAN BOND, ISSUED BY THE IRISH DIRECTORY FOR SECURING THE INDEPENDENCE OF IRELAND.

THE IRISH BOND.

We give a fac-simile of the Irish Bond issued by the Fenian Brotherhood, ostensibly to assist the Irish people in establishing a republic in their own land.

The Fenian Brotherhood have long considered this step, but did not adopt the measure, however, until the home affairs called for it, and the material resources as command seemed to justify the appeal to those who favored the principle at stake. About two months ago the policy was finally decided upon by the governing council, who entrusted all negotiations to their President, Col. William R. Roberts. Before entering upon the work the best legal advice in the country was had, and a course laid out which enables the parties concerned to keep inside all provisions of national and international codes and comities. An exposition of Fenian power satisfied the Bank Note Company that all was in good faith, and on a fair way to success; hence they at once assumed the responsibility of being the medium through which the instruments would be put forth to the world.

Six weeks ago, then, the company entered upon its labors, and succeeded in having specimens ready to exhibit to the Congress, thus manifesting remarkable energy and celerity, more especially when we recollect that the designs were entirely new, necessitating a preparation of appliances for the special requirements.

There is an ingenious system of numbering devised by Messrs. W. R. Roberts and P. J. Meehan, and known to the Fenian Finance Bureau alone. This the engravers cannot describe; but it is said to form one of the securities against fraud in issue. None are to issue from any quarter except the general finance office in this city. This department is to be organized by the Fenian Senate, now in session here.

Though the bonds are not yet ready for issue, yet the demand is brisk, and many a roll of greenbacks flows into the agency for the coveted securities from those who have faith.

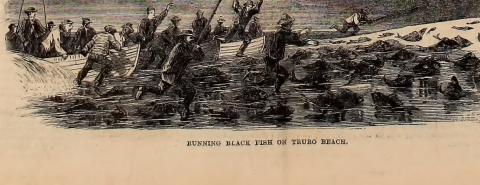
HUNTING OSTRICHES AND WILD HORSES.

We had taken three brace of birds, when an ostrich starting before us, Candioti, jun., gave the war-whoop of pursuit to his Gaucho followers, and to me the well-known intimation of "Vamos, Señor Don Juan." Off went, or rather flew, the Gauchos; my steed bounded away in their company, and we were now, instead of tracking an invisible bird through tufted grass, in full cry after the nimble, conspicuous, and athletic ostrich. With great erect, and angry eye, towering above all herbage, our game flew from us, by the combined aid of wings and limbs, at the rate of sixteen miles an hour. The chase lasted half that time; when an Indian peon, starting ahead of the close phalanx of his mounted competitors, whirled his balas, with admirable grace and dexterity, around his head, and with deadly aim flung them over the bird running, half-flying, but now devoted ostrich. Instantaneously entangled, down came the giant bird, rolling, fluttering, panting; and being in an instant dispatched, the company of the field stripped him of his feathers, stuck them in their girdles, and left the plucked and mangled carcass in the plain, a prey to the vultures. Which were already hovering around us.

We now came upon an immense herd of wild horses, and Candioti, jun., said, "Now, Señor Don Juan, I must show you how we tame a colt." So saying, the word was given for the pursuit of the herd, and off, once more, like lightning, darted the Gaucho horsemen, Candioti and myself keeping up with them. The herd consisted of about two thousand horses, neighing and snorting, with ears erect and flowing tails, their manes outspread to the wind, affrighted the moment they were conscious of pursuit. The Gauchos set up their usual cry; the dogs were left in the distance, and it was not until we had followed the flock at full speed, and without a check, for five miles, that the two headmost peons launched their bolas at the horse which each had respectively singled out of the herd. Down to the ground, with frightful somersets, came two gallant colts. The herd continued its headlong flight, leaving two men who had brought down the colts bestrode them as they still lay on the ground. In a moment the lazos which bound their legs were loosed, and at the same time a shout from the field so frightened the potros, that up they started on all fours, but to their astonishment, each with a rider on his back, riveted, as it were, to the saddle, and controlling them by means of a never-before-dreamed-of bit in his mouth. The outrageous animals to unseat them; and in less than an hour from the time of their mounting, it was very evident who were to be the masters. The horses did their very worst, the Indians never lost either the security or the grace of their seats; till, after two hours of the most violent efforts to rid themselves of their burden, the horses were so exhausted, lost, drenched in sweat, with gored and palpitating sides, and hanging down their heads, they stood for five minutes together, panting and confounded, but they made not a single effort to move. Then came the Gaucho's turn to exercise his more positive authority. Hitherto he had been entirely on the defensive. His object was simply to keep his seat and tire out his horse. He now wanted to move it in a given direction, wayward, zigzag; often interrupted was his course at first, still the Gaucho made for a given point; and they advanced towards it, till at the end of about three hours the now subdued animals moved in nearly a direct line, and, in company with the other horses, to the ground, or small subordinate establishment on the estate to which we were repairing. When we got there, the two horses, which as shortly before had been free as the wind, they fled to a stake of the corral, the slaves of lordly man, and all hope of emancipation was at an end.

CATCHING WILD HORSES IN PARAGUAY.

RUNNING BLACK FISH ON TRURO BEACH.



THE 10th ult. was a marked day in Provincetown Bay, Mass. Upon that day a school of black fish came into the harbor, and were set on by the fishermen with boats, nets, oars and every available mode of capture. All day they were thrashing the waters, and driving the fish in millions on the beach, until 40 tons were bagged, or barreled, or wagoned, or boated; and the fortunate fishermen settled, as the result of their day's work, $3,500 on the spot, from parties in Provincetown, who bought them as they lay.

SHOOTING TURTLES ON THE NIAGARA RIVER.

ONE who seeks adventure and sport everywhere, writes us, with the sketches, about hunting turtles:

"In the broad but clear waters of the Niagara river, several miles above the Falls, there are two or three large bays, formed by the winding course of the noble stream, where the current becomes comparatively slow, so that the mudturtles appear to need willpittle or no difficulty in steaming it; for if the sportsman will take the trouble of concealing himself on the adjoining bank, where he may occasionally meet with bushes or underwood, or lie anchored off in the stream, at some distance, in a small canoe, that looks more like a floating log of timber than a navigable craft, he will have opportunities of seeing these creatures rowing themselves from one part of the bay to another, for the purpose of finding some suitable stone, or stump, or prostrate tree, upon which to crawl for the purpose of taking a nap for a few hours. Many a time have I, accompanied by a Canadian friend, repaired to some of these bays in the river, particularly during the months of May and June, since at that season, the water of the river still continuing cold, from the recent melting of the ice in the lake from which it issues, they leave their favorite element as much as possible, in order to enjoy the more congenial temperature of the atmosphere, which has, by that period, become pretty warm.

"We used to reach the place we had fixed upon for a few hours' diversion at an early hour in the morning, one of us encowering himself on the river bank, an the other dropping gently down the stream, and anchoring within gunshot distance from where we expected our game to make their appearance. We never attempted to shoot them with anything but rifle-ball, for the largest common shot would have harmlessly glanced off their armor, though they had been fired down upon from a moderate height, and in nearly a perpendicular direction. If a ball struck one of them and wounded it severely, it most likely would tumble off its perch upon its back; and while it was struggling and attempting to turn itself over, the person in the canoe would paddle up to it, and haul it into his little vessel; but if not mortally wounded, and they managed to keep the right side uppermost, before the canoe could reach them, they would have dived to the bottom, and might be seen, for the water was very clear, paddling along at a great speed, to some place of security. When there are several upon the same log, provided those who fire at them can keep themselves hid and perfectly quiet, two or three may often be shot, one after the other, before the remainder of them take the alarm, and plunge heavily into the water.

"We have captured nearly a score in a favorable morning, including all sizes; and, by way of excuse for not being considered wantonly cruel, we took them home with us, and invariably had some of them dressed; but, though with a strong desire to do so, we never relished them much. Had we been near a comb manufactory, the shells of the large ones would have been worth a trifle, but, that not being the case, they were utterly valueless. We had another plea for occasionally engaging in the destruction of those creatures, and, the unfavorable reputation the farmers give them, by asserting that they are great destroyers of both ducklings and goslings; and I afterwards lived to prove that to least the former part of the accusation was correct, for I have over and over again had ducklings of my own carried off by mud-turtles within sight of my own dwelling."

THE STORY OF LOBENSKI.

THE following brief story is given upon the authority of a relation of the persons to whom the events happened:

In a village, about seven miles from Warsaw, there lived an old man named John Lobenski. As his family had been one of long standing in that locality, and as he married nearly all over Europe, and had become acquainted with several languages. But through some misfortunes he had become poor, and when he first left his village he was supporting himself as a teacher of French and Italian at one of the public schools in the neighborhood. His wife had died a year or two before, and she had hardly consisted of a son, about twenty-four years of age, and a daughter, about two years younger, who were a great comfort to their aged parent, for they were very affectionate and dutiful.

When the Poles had formed their plans for rising to assert their freedom, some of young Lobenski's friends were foremost in the movement, and they tried to persuade him to join them. For a long time he was restrained from taking an active part by the entreaties of his father, whose more mature judgment saw that the Russian power was too mighty for the Poles.

"My son," he would say, "we must for the present bow to the stern oppression of Providence, for, without we obtain more foreign help than we can reasonably expect, our rising will only make our bondage the more severe."

At length, however, the sanguine feelings of patriotism overcame the sound advice of young man, and he took leave of his weeping father and sister to join the Polish army, which was secretly assembling in a thickly wooded district, several days' journey to the south of Warsaw.

His good sense and brave bearing immediately placed him in an influential position amongst the patriots, and he was made a captain, and posted with a body of men in a thicket on the outskirts of the forest, which was nearest to the road that the Russians were expected to pass as soon as they were informed of the movements of the Poles.

The evening after he had taken up this position, a body of Russians, not very far numerous as the whole of the Polish army, bivouacked in a small wood close by the one where Lobenski was concealed, because they were nearer to further than that night, by much fatigued with a long day's march. Small as was the band of Poles, they determined on attacking them, with every chance of success. In the dead of the night they made a furious charge on the encampment, and, before the Russians had time to arm, they slew hundreds of them.

The inequality of numbers was too great. The Poles, however, fought till morning, losing but very few of their number, and performing prodigies of valor. But as soon as daylight appeared, the Russians surrounded the little troop, and took them prisoners.

Young Lobenski and his companions were carried off, and lodged in a prison on the banks of the River Dnieper. They were here subjected to very rigorous treatment, though the place was not adapted for the close confinement of prisoners, having originally been the palace of a Russian noble. After remaining there about three weeks, Lobenski and two others, who were good swimmers, effected their escape by jumping from a very lofty window into the river, the height of which was so great that the Russians did not conceive it possible that any one would be so bold as to attempt to leap from it, and had not, therefore, secured it.

The three brave fellows had watched their opportunity when it was tremendously stormy and quite dark; and by this precaution they avoided heard nothing of their movements. They swam in the direction in which they knew there were some boats, and, seizing one of them, and taking advantage of the wind, which was blowing a hurricane in their favor, they speedily passed the Russian frontier, and landed on that part of Poland which was not strictly guarded, because its inhabitants had not joined the insurgents.

Lobenski, to disguise himself, obtained the worn-out dress of a Russian soldier; but wherever it was desirable he made it known that he was a Pole. In this way he traveled as fast as possible towards his native village, being very anxious to know what had become of his father and sister.

When he arrived there, he found that the village had been sacked by the Russians, and that many of its inhabitants had been put to the sword, and others taken captive. He made earnest inquiries after his beloved relatives, and was soon informed of the truth by some of his former neighbors, who had secured their own lives and estates by complete submission to the Russians.

It appeared that Lobenski's bravery in the night when he was captured, had attracted the notice of the Russian general, who learned that he and his fellow-townsmen were amongst the most active of the rebels, as they were called by the Russians. The army in consequence marched directly on the village, and took many of the inhabitants prisoners, amongst whom were old John Lobenski and his daughter.

TURTLE SHOOTING ON THE NIAGARA RIVER.

As the Polish prisoners had now become inconveniently numerous in the strongholds near Poland, the Emperor had issued orders for them to be sent off in a consignment to the wilds of Siberia. They had to march on foot day after day in letters, in the depth of winter, without distinction of age or sex, each company guarded by a troop of horse soldiers. At night they sheltered themselves by digging holes in the snow, unless they were lucky enough to reach a village at nightfall, when they used to be miserably lodged in the stables and outhouses belonging to the inhabitants.

In one of these companies Lobenski and his daughter had to travel. Many times in the course of the journey the old man sank down, overpowered with fatigue; and, had it not been for the affectionate attentions of his daughter Irvana, he would have certainly perished.

Young Lobenski obtained a considerable sum of money from a rich relation, who, although he appeared favorable to the Russians, and was, therefore, left unmolested by them, did not forget his duty to his family. Lobenski, thus provided, took very possible means of disguising himself. He assumed a different name, and called himself a Russian. He had learned the particulars of his father's sufferings, and knew exactly the route which would be taken by the company in which he was a prisoner.

He accordingly made a hasty journey to the town of Okhansk, through which they were to pass, hired a house and some Russian servants, and bought several horses, as if he intended to take up his abode there.

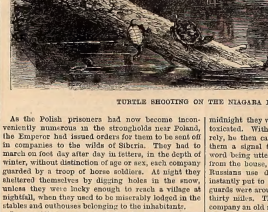
After he had remained about a fortnight, and had begun to acquire the confidence of the people about him, by a display of wealth and great liberality, the prisoners arrived, and amongst them his father and sister. By a little contrivance, and the assistance of some of his servants, whom he had secured by the promise of a rich reward, and without saying who it was he was going to deliver, he managed that old Lobenski and Irvana should be lodged in an outbuilding attached to his own residence. The place seemed so secured that the guards did not think it needful to watch the prisoners very closely. Young Lobenski gave them plenty to eat and drink, and by midnight they were all sound asleep or helplessly intoxicated. With those servants on whom he could rely, he then carried off his father and sister, giving them a signal to remain perfectly quiet. Without a word being uttered, they were conveyed some distance from the house, put into a carriage, such as the rich Russians use during winter, and the horses were instantly put to the top of their speed; and, before the guards were aroused, the party had traveled more than thirty miles. The soldiers, only missing from their company an old man and a young girl, and not thinking that they were at all connected with the sudden absence of the master of the house, with whom in fact they had nothing to do, gave up the pursuit, and went on their journey.

I shall not attempt to tell you the joy experienced by all the Lobenskis in once more meeting each other, when their first surprise was over, and all the circumstances were explained.

Young Lobenski immediately provided Russian dresses for his father and sister; and, as soon as possible, he sold his carriage, lest it should lead to his detection; and, by different modes of traveling, he reached the coast of the Black Sea, about a fortnight's journey, took shipping for one of the Ionian islands, and from thence came to England, where he found a safe home. And although the whole of the money that his kind relation had given him was expended, he and his beloved relatives thanked God that they had escaped from a tyranny much worse than poverty of any kind.

THE ANTS OF BRAZIL.

THE ants of the tropics do not resemble the timid insects of our cool climate, which avoid mankind, and contend themselves with making their nests in the trunk of a tree or under a stone, and at most cheating the domestic fowls of a few particles of grain. They are a hardy set, confident in their strength and intelligence, and make themselves inaccessible retreats. Before the arrival of the white man, the formiga was the true queen of the forest. The savage brings who then represented humanity in this region, had rather a vague instinct of congregation than the true spirit of association. The idea of labor and solidarity, for example, was entirely wanting with them. A prisoner was to them only a victim condemned to serve as a feast. The ant only learned to cultivate higher notions.



At the present day it remains in Brazil one of the most perfect illustrations of those strange laws which introduce into the world of nature, under the form of instinct, certain forces of the moral world. The habitation of the formiga de Brazil is a citadel closed in on every side, communicating with the outer world only by secret passages. If there are any wood-like in the vicinity, the formiga traverses them, takes them to the habitation, and thus forms itself a sort of farmyard. A regular distribution of fresh leaves suffices to render captivity supportable to the prisoners, and no attempt at escape is henceforth to be feared. Some species of ants, given to idleness, commit raids upon the more feeble races, and seize their eggs. The larvæ which are hatched from these become so many slaves. These slaves with mandibles accept their fate and perform service to the aristocratic race.

When the workers go to forage in the fields, and the task is hard or perilous, the colony is divided into two sections. The most active climb the trunk of the tree which is to be plundered, run out upon the branches to the bow of the leaves, and cut off the stems with their serrated teeth. In an hour the foliage has disappeared. The tree seems as if blasted by lightning. In the meantime, those that remained upon the ground seize the leaves as they fall and carry them away. If the burden is too heavy, this column separates into two groups, one of which separates the leaf into segments, while the other takes it away and stores it. Gardeners especially dread their ravages. If they neglect to surround their fields with a ditch filled with water, or if the latter dries up, goods-bye to flowers, fruits and vegetables—all disappear in a night. A well-filled ditch does not always suffice to keep such watchful and enterprising marauders at a distance. It is necessary to see that the current does not occasionally bring down a dead branch, which lodges and forms a communication between the two sides. A gardener told me that one morning he found one of his beds completely devastated by a nocturnal visit of ants, into which, while it was a very low-lying and deep one, was full of water. Curious to know how the enemy had gained access to a place he supposed so well protected, he set himself to watch the movements and observe the route they took on their return. The ants having attained their night's task, the column soon formed, and proceeded to a tree that stood on the edge of the ditch. Climbing the trunk of this, they advanced to the branches, on one morning he found one of his beds completely devastated by a nocturnal visit of ants, into which, while it was a very low-lying and deep one, was full of water. Curious to know how the enemy had gained access to a place he supposed so well protected, he set himself to watch the movements and observe the route they took on their return. The ants having attained their night's task, the column soon formed, and proceeded to a tree that stood on the edge of the ditch. Climbing the trunk of this, they advanced to the branches, on one of which was an orange-tree, that was situated on the other side of the ditch. The victimized gardener had not observed that their subterranean way had passed under the ditch and formed a bridge in mid-air. A few weeks before he had been obliged to redig his ditch to twice its former depth, in order to interrupt the subterranean galleries which his indefatigable enemies had tunneled under the water.

In the houses things are very different. Ordinarily no attention is paid to these inconvenient neighbors, which are thought to come, over the kitchen, down into the dishes. If too numerous a tribe happen to penetrate the wainscoting and get into a room, they are treated to a shower of boiling water. The wood thereupon make a rapid retreat, in order to hold a council of war, and consequently resort to appointed or skillful leaders, and select a less dangerous route; but the rain outdoors prevents the ants from getting out their earthen embankments, and, as soon as their constructions completely occupy the ground, they are obliged to escape through the holes and fissures of the walls, and so enter the habitations of the lower order. When these swarms repeatedly make their appearance, the owner is convinced that there is something more than a single family; in fact, that there is a long series of generations confined in too narrow limits, and trying to find out room. It is necessary, then, to have the grand remedy, and a messenger is sent for the formigueiro, or ant man.

The formigueiro is a man of great importance in a country where the ant has such destructive teeth, or rather mandibles. As the South American is not given to over-exertion, and, moreover, as a single ant or mite is too common an event to excite much attention, the ant is not disposed to believe in the use of a man who he is sent for. An enormous forge-bellows which he carries with him, constitutes his entire apparatus. After a most inspection of the ant's lodge, he stops up the openings leading under the house, except a central one, which he enlarges, in order to exterminate a furnace, and to station the pair of bellows. During this operation the negroes go into the neighboring forest to cut a certain species of wood, which he describes to them. The wood being cut, and the furnace prepared, a fire is lighted, and by the aid of his enormous bellows, he forces the smoke under-ground through the ant-hills. The smoke, after traversing these porous constructions, escapes everywhere from the fissures in the masonry and through the floor. Then leaving the cause of the fire and the bellows to the negroes, with express orders to keep up the action, he goes from house to house to stop with clay all the fissures which permit any escape.

Let us now descend underground, and see what is going on in the ants. At the unusual noise which followed the arrival of the masons, and with stopping up the openings, the industrious insects quickly retreat to their cells, protect their eggs and watch over their stores. Upon seeing the first suffocating puffs of smoke, they comprehend that they are threatened with an extreme danger, and that their only safety is in flight. At the same moment, upon a given signal, each seizes an egg, and takes refuge into the subterranean galleries that lead into the gardens or fields, leaving behind only those stores which an industrious insect can easily replace in a country that has no winter. But here a cruel reception awaits the poor ants; the blue smoke wreaths are before them, and there is no hope. Like a consummate tactician, the formigueiro, having closed all the fissures of the interior, goes round the house to watch any egress, and does not cease day nor night. But is there not a last chance to be attempted? What if the old, abandoned galleries were cleared, or new ones were made? Not a bit! Ants drop their burdens and set bravely to work. New outlets are made, and they again seize their eggs. Already they imagine themselves safe; but the smoke has again to be braved them, and at the moment when they are about to emerge, a stroke of the spade then they are pursued by a ruthless enemy. In the meantime, the negroes posted at the hollows constantly send fresh quantities of hot vapor, that scorch and carbonize the final bodies of these brave insects. At the same time the air becomes more and more rare, and their efforts relax. Soon, no further attempts are made to escape. The operation is drawing to a close. Their strength fails them in attempting the last outlet, and they sink exhausted. The next day, when everything is sufficiently cool, they are found in their galleries, lying side by side with their calcined eggs, but still recognizable. The earth taken from their nests, and their bodies, form one of the most powerful manures.

The flooding rains, which, for six months inundate the soil, fortunately place a limit to the prolific increase of these marauding insects. The formiguiera is likewise often needed in the fields, especially when the land is being cleared. In these cases the negroes blow into the smoke forcibly into the ground, while puffs of blue smoke, which sometimes rise at a distance of more than a hundred feet from the fire, sufficiently indicate the extent of the underground hazeda to be destroyed, and give an idea of the ravages that it (sic) has committed. In justice, however, we must add, that the ant is not without some utility. The large winged species serve as food for the blacks, especially those who feed a predilection for their African customs. It is especially in summer, in the anstery season, when the exhausted nmles sink by thousands on the arid soil, that these sable savages themselves at their ease. It is needless to say that they are not the only ones to hunt this rare game, and that the saucaree, or monkeys, keep up an active competition against them.

CALKINS & CO., 538 and 540 Broadway, N. Y., are the appointed Managers of the Great Distribution Association of Manufacturers, which has been organized with the special object of giving away with the enormous profits exacted from the people by jobbers and wholesale and retail dealers in their various departments, for which the manufacturers receive, on the average, but $3, cost of manufacturing at retail, from $6 to $15, after passing through three or four hands. This splendid stock of the leading manufacturers embraces 5,000 of Solid Gold jewelry—watches, silverware, &c., worth $2,500,000 at the lowest retail sale by the trade. CALKINS & CO., managers for the association, for $500,000, (manufacturers' cost) will dispose of 250,000 each and every article, subject to the following regulations:—

SEALED ADVERTISEMENTS of the various articles are well mixed, and when ordered are taken out indiscriminately and sold at $2 each, without regard to value, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the advertisement you will have what you want, and then it is at your option to send two dollars and take the article or not. Purchasers may order from one to fifty. Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piece, or any article of jewelry on our list. We shall send out 250,000 each of the above, and they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the money in every case, for there are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the best article, whatever it may be, can be had for the asking. A splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $10, or a fine Rosewood Morocco Photograph Album, worth $6. Send 25 cents for an envelope.

Each envelope contains a printed collection of useful receipts and popular songs, worth many dollars.

Persons ordering envelopes will receive them promptly by mail, postage paid, together with the following premiums upon sending the cash.

5 for 25, with a Silver Watch, Diamond worth 50 cts.
8 for $1.00 " Silver Nut Pick " 25.00
15 for $2.00 " Gold Ring " 2.00
17 for 3.00 " Silver Fruit Knife " 3.00

65 for 10.00 " Gold Double Locket " 12.00
100 for 15.00 " Fine Silver watch " 20.00
200 for 30.00 " Silver Hunting Watch " 40.00

Circulars, with prices of the articles and the premiums as above will be sent with the envelopes.

From the Press.

The Great Gold Gift Distribution.

We desire to call the attention of our readers to the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing and Jewellers Association, with the "Great Gold Gift Distribution" advertised in our columns, and which the purchaser receives in the shape of a package of miscellaneous goods, upon investigation, to be more cash value than the price paid up for the package, and in addition to the cash goods of worthless stones, from the second batch of manufacturers of the Gold Gift Distribution, sold by Messrs. Calkins & Co. but is worth all it is represented to be, and, from the well known character and reputation of the firm itself is a sufficient guarantee for the responsibility of the association they represent. Should this not be the case, visitors would not throng their establishment as they do at 538 and 540 Broadway, as we hear now do, nor would they go away with faces so bright and full of satisfaction as they appear.—Daily Eagle, April 1st, 1865.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every regiment, and to those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

Address CALKINS & CO., Managers, Headquarters, 538 and 540 Broadway, N. Y., or, if nearer, 30 South Fourth street, St. Louis, Mo., or 83 and 85 Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers Agents,
No. 107 Broadway, N. Y.
Announce that all of the above list of goods will be sold AT ONE DOLLAR EACH!
In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, the quantity of Valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English markets, has been thrown for sale in this country, MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE! Under these circumstances, we have made the above Great Sale, and for the principal European manufacturers have resolved upon a

to be divided according to the following regulations:
Certificates, stating the various articles or sets of jewelry or pianos, will be carefully sealed up, and when ordered, will be taken out without regard to choice and sent by mail, thus showing no favoritism. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not, as you choose. Certificates of Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR CERTIFICATE.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage and doing the business. 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is ordered. The Certificate will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.
The Lafayette (Ind.) Daily Courier, March 18, 1865, says: "A better opportunity to obtain a valuable assortment of jewelry cannot be found on the continent than is offered by the above new offering. Arrandale & Co. occupy a high position in commercial circles in this country, and their promises are sacredly kept. Their statements may be implicitly relied upon, both as to the character of their goods and the manner of dispos'l. Ladies especially, in all parts of the country, can purchase pretty articles, and if not in any of our fair readers desire to interest themselves in the enterprise, they can easily do so with perfect safety."

"GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining valuable and fashionable rings, silverware, &c., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 107 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, which they intend to sell at one dollar each, regardless of value. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certain one of the articles, inclose one dollar, and receive it by return mail. The transaction is a novel one, and has been generally known to us, and we believe them to be every way responsible and reliable."—Boston Evening Transcript and New York Daily Times, Sept. 6, 1864.

"We know the firm in question to be very respectable and thoroughly worthy of the confidence and recommend our friends to read their advertisement."—New York Leader, Sept. 6, 1864.

"EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and comfortable employment for ladies at home is the sale of certificates for the Great Gift Distribution of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only in filling her own time profitably, but in supplying a few friends whom she sold the Certificates, as well he seen by our advertising columns, and which we can recommend as a reliable concern."—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1865.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864: "Our readers will remember the notice we made of the agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 30 articles sent as a sample by that firm to the office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth double the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times."

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar, the other inducements which can be learned on application. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 18 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps.

FIRST PREMIUM.
IMPROVED
$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5
THE EMBODIMENT OF
PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Originally Patented May 13, 1863; improvement patented June 9, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegant Combination. Novelty in motion in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making 16 stitches to each revolution of the wheel. Will Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Change of Stitches for any kind of work, or over or under, and will last a LIFETIME; being original it is no infringement on any other Machine. To any one a small Pocket Machine pushed by hand over the work like others advertised, but works on a Table, and the work must pass through it like all Regular Machines.

"This beautiful Machine makes the Running Stitch at the rate of several yards per minute."—Frank Leslie's.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this premium Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.

Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Sole delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 532 VOL. XXI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 9, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

The Modern Huitzilpochtli.

In the mythology of ancient Mexico there existed a divinity or demon corresponding with the Hindoo Siva, or the Destroyer. He bore the name of Huitzilpochtli, and his statue still exists in the Museum of Mexico, covered all over with the hideous emblems of his attributes. The symbols of destruction are most prominent. He is entwined with serpents, a tiger crouches at his feet, a girdle of dissevered human heads depends from his waist, and a necklace of skulls hangs around his neck. Every combination of the ghastly, the horrible and the loathsome is invoked to portray the bloody and relentless character which was ascribed to him by the dark imagination of the Indian. On the festivals of this dread divinity the temples of Mexico literally flowed with human blood.

It was reserved for European civilization to give to Mexico a realization of the black conception to which the Indians paid the worship of fear. European policy has vitalized the repulsive statue of the Destroyer in the Aztec pantheon. It has placed or sought to place, through force and fraud, an adventurer of one of the most detested of the ruling houses of Christendom, on the throne of Mexico, who has just signalized his career of usurpation by decrees more barbarous than ever brought the flush of mingled shame and anger to the brow of mankind, since the days of Tamerlane and Ghengis Khan!

On the 3d of October the so-called Mexican Emperor issued an order, that all persons taken in arms against his pretended authority should be summarily shot within twenty-four hours, and that all persons discovered harboring, aiding or abetting those contesting his rule, should be severely punished. Such an order would be regarded as bloody and barbarous, even if it were issued against persons in armed insurrection against legitimate and well-established authority. But what are we to think of it, and how are we to characterize it, when coming from a foreign adventurer seeking to overthrow the legitimate Government and the chosen Constitution of the the people of an independent State? Have the centuries rolled back, and is Tartar barbarism once more to resume its sway over mankind? Where, out of Africa, in this the last half of our boasted 19th century, can we find a parallel for atrocities such as this Austrian usurper is daily committing in Mexico, under the pretext "of restoring order," and "spreading civilization?" The King of Dahomey, more merciful than Maximilian, does not slaughter all his prisoners of war. Some of them he mercifully spares to be his slaves!

The last mail from Mexico brings us the news that Gen. Artiaga, and eighteen of his officers, recently captured by a body of Maximilian's mercenaries, were summarily shot, in pursuance of the infamous order to which we have adverted, and that many others, officers and men, who have fallen into the Imperialists hands have shared the same fate! At the mere statement of this fact, all men are astonished and appalled. Few can comprehend the possibility of such deeds in this age, and are disposed to regard their statement as made to excite sympathy and rouse resentment. But, unfortunately, it is a fact that Mexicans of the highest eminence, struggling to maintain the independence of their country, and in support of a Government chosen by the people, and which is still recognized by every American State except Brazil, are taken and shot summarily, without mercy. The sanctity that belongs to a prisoner of war, which is implied in according quarter, and which is regarded by all except the lowest savages, is constantly violated by the mongrel horde of Maximilian's mercenaries, in observance of his direct command!

In the case of Gen. Artiaga, there appears to have been something of personal apprehension and animosity. It was well understood that he was the choice of the Mexican people as the successor of Juarez, and there seems to have been a special anxiety and effort to disperse his forces and secure his person. Under the circumstances any rival chieftain, even the basest of filibusters, would have felt called on to treat him with special respect, even while depriving him of liberty. But no such magnanimity is to be found in the satrap and tool of Napoleon! No such generosity finds place in the cold and cruel heart of a Hapsburg! These are not the sentiments that consecrate the movement for the "regeneration of Mexico," which the perjurer of December tells us is to be the crowning glory of his reign! The inauguration of that grand movement was in fraud and treachery, its progress has been through usurpation, and as if to make all its bad conditions complete, it adds to its repulsive features the crimes of assassination and murder. It was reserved for Maximilian to break and contemn the most sacred law which civilization has instituted to prevent war from becoming wholesale and indiscriminate massacre. It was reserved for him to throw down the barrier which humanity has built up to restrain the excited and cruel passions of men, and save the lives of the vanquished. On him will rest the infamy of raising on land the black flag, the skull and cross-bones of that piracy which has been hunted from the seas. He has repudiated all the ameliorations which the nobler aspirations of man, and his religious and moral instincts, had succeeded in introducing in the bloody code of war. For this, to say nothing now of the guilt of attempting to re-impose a rejected and hated system on a free people, he deserves and will receive the execrations of mankind. His figure will stand in history as hideous as that which, in his intellectual gloom and moral night-mare, the savage Aztec conjured up as an embodiment of the evil and destructive forces of nature, and which now repels the gaze of the curious and shuddering visitor in the Museum of Mexico.

It is this monster we are called on to tolerate as a neighbor, to recognize as an apostle of civilization, and accept as the regenerator of Mexico!

Not until the injunction of the Decalogue, "Thou shalt not kill," shall be rejected, the behests of Christ on the Mount forgotten, and the statue of the horrible Huitzlipochtli supersede the cross on our altars, will the American people accept, recognize or tolerate in any capacity, on any part of this continent, a man who has made Assassination a measure of his policy, and openly sanctioned Murder!

The "Shenandoah" at Home.

Something over a year ago the "Sea King," a steamship, afterwards called the "Shenandoah," sailed out of the port of Liverpool. On the 5th of November, she returned to the same port—"went home," in fact. In the interval, from her departure to her return, she destroyed upwards of forty unarmed American merchant vessels, the greater part of them after the defeat and surrender of Lee, and the break down of the so-called Southern Confederacy.

The Shenandoah was a British ship, built and manned in Liverpool, and armed with British guns. There was no American on board of her, besides the captain, except, perhaps, one or two officers. She never entered a Southern port, and was probably never within sight of the States to which she pretended to belong.

It was right and proper, therefore, that she should go back to the spot she came from. It was natural enough that she should there put herself under the protection of a British vessel of war, and it is not unnatural that her commander should open correspondence with Earl Russell. As was to be expected, notwithstanding for eight months this vessel has been a simple pirate, with no shadow of a government to throw over its proceedings a pretext of legitimacy, her officers and crew were permitted to land, undisturbed, on British soil, and to dispose as they pleased of their ill-gotten gains. The buccaneers, in the days of their glory, never paraded the streets of Kingston with a more brazen front, than do these outlaws of the Shenandoah the avenues of Liverpool. They are the envy of their sympathizing countrymen, who regard their infamous deeds as glorious, chiefly because they were perpetrated to the injury of Americans!

It is true the British Government, anxious to get rid of a disagreeable issue of its own raising, handed over the Shenandoah to the American consul, who was stupid enough—we beg our readers' pardon—to accept her, the theory being that the United States is residuary legatee of Jeff Davis's Confederacy. By this acceptance we admit that the Shenandoah was really a rebel craft, when the fact is she was simply an English pirate. Caught on the high seas, we should have treated her and her crew as pirates. If any of her men are ever found in this country, they will undoubtedly be arrested and tried as pirates, and if convicted of piracy they will be hung. England has thrown her protection over them, but she should be called on to surrender them for trial, or arraign them before her own tribunals. Their trial by an English court would probably be a farce, as were the trials of the pirates of the Chesapeake in New Brunswick, and the raiders of St. Albans in Canada. But there would be in the pretence of an attempt to do justice some concession to the outraged sentiment of Christendom. As it is, the unqualified release of the pirates is equally an injury and an insult. Whatever claim of legitimacy may have been set up for the operations of the Anglo-rebel vessels during the war, every aggressive act of theirs after the war was over is sheer piracy. We know the Shenandoah did prosecute her career of arson and destruction on the high seas, not only after the war was over, but after her captain knew it was over. The British Government well understood that such was the fact, and knew, also, full well, its duty in the premises. Failing to do that duty, it added one more injury to the long list already registered against her, and for which reparation will sooner or later be exacted.

We hope the President will reverse the hasty acceptance of the Shenandoah by our Consul, and turn her back on the hands of those who built, equipped and manned her.

Archbishop Cullen, who is, we believe, the leading Catholic prelate of Ireland, has issued an address on "Fenianism," from which we infer he regards all persons bearing the name of Fenians to be sons of Belial and Voltaire. "They have proposed," says the Archbishop, "nothing less than to destroy the faith of the people by circulating books like those of the impious Voltaire." While in Canada the faction of Irishmen, called "Orangemen," are denouncing the Fenians in all sorts of opprobrious terms, in Ireland itself the Archbishop is trying to make Fenianism odious by representing it as the offspring and ally of Orangeism. "Orangeism," says the trenchant Archbishop, "is, logically, the parent of Ribandism and Fenianism." The Archbishop also runs a tilt against "Freemasonry," which, to his excited imagination, has something to do with the "Head Centres," and "Top Centres," "Bottom Centres," and "Middle Centres,"—we should not be surprised if there was a "Centre Centre" of Fenianism. The Catholic clergy of Ireland are, no doubt, openly hostile to the Fenian movement—if there really be one. For what reason is not clear. If, however, this opposition should tend to weaken their hitherto almost absolute power over the souls and bodies of their followers, it may prove a thing not to be regretted. No people in the world stand more in need of mental and moral emancipation. As regards any hope the Fenians in Ireland may have of assistance from the United States, the Archbishop speaks with sarcastic contempt. "Unless," he says, "the Fenians in the Great Republic armed themselves with swords as long as those of the Great Fenian giant of olden times, and struck their enemies across the vast ocean, I do not see what service they could render." When a high Roman Catholic dignitary condescends to satire, there is a strong presumption that the object of his ridicule is essentially absurd.

Lord Palmerston was buried where he, probably, would have wished to lie—in the great depository of departed greatness, Westminster Abbey. The ground around him, says a London newspaper, "is thickly sown with illustrious seed. On his left, are Lord Chatham, and the two great rivals—Pitt and Fox; at his feet, Canning, the leader by whom he abided so faithfully, and his son, the Viceroy of India, whom he supported, through good and evil report, with zeal, firmness, and loyalty. Nearer the door lies Grattan, and again, on the other side, Wilberforce, and a name as detested as his own by the enemies of England—Castlereagh. Over his head, towers the monument of Lord Chatham, where, as Lord Macaulay says, 'With eagle eye and outstretched arm, the great Commoner seems to bid England be of good cheer, and hurl defiance at her foes;' and on the other side, the statue of Canning seems almost to turn toward the newcomer, as if to bid him welcome. Nearer still, is the monument of Lord Mansfield, the great Judge, but, equally great as the 'silver-tongued' orator of the House of Commons; and, hard by, though his ashes do not rest here, the statue of Sir Robert Peel commemorates a career not so lengthened, but hardly less successful, or less distinguished by public services. Lord Palmerston's grave lies immediately at the foot of the ambitious trophy, which has been raised to three of Lord Rodney's naval officers, and, in opening it, it is said that the workmen struck on the virgin earth, and brought up a light sand, which must have formed the original soil on which the Abbey is built."

The great German philologist, Grimm, said of the English language—"It possesses a veritable power of expression such as, perhaps, never stood at the command of any other language of man."

The eulogies on the late Lord Palmerston, whether in the press or from the pulpit, are either fantastic or profane. The editor of the London Times, who was frequently the guest of the deceased Lord, considers that his greatness and power lay chiefly in his convivial habits, and it compares him to One who is said to have come eating and drinking! Dr. Stanley, dean of Westminster, tells us, that "of all political chiefs, he accomplished the greatest results by the lowest and most ordinary means,"—meaning good dinners, good sherry, etc. Dr. Cumming thinks his Lordship was a good judge of a sermon, as he praised one of his, and assures us that he lived and died a good Christian, while the Pall Mall Gazette, seeing that the late Premier was a gay man of the world, who made Bishops, but never pretended to any piety, wishes to know if all the good people can be sincere in speaking of him as if he had died in the odor of sanctity, to which Earl Shaftesbury testifies, and of which there can be no longer any doubt—an example, as one of the papers has it, of "jolly life, ending with eternal glory."

False literary reclamation is a crime in no way differing in principle, and hardly in degree, from forgery. An amusing exposé of an instance of this kind was made by Oliver Wendall Holmes, in his recent lecture, in this city, on "The Poetry of the War. It will be remembered that in the height of the late contest, there appeared a poem, entitled "Canaan," which attracted some attention, and to which there soon appeared several claimants, as authors. One of the claimants was a Southerner, and two were ladies,—one of them residing in Ohio, and the other in some Eastern State. Dr. Holmes felt complimented by these pretensions, but a reasonable regard for truth compelled him to state that, for bad or for worse, he was himself the author. We do not envy what Sir Chawles Yellowplush would call "the feelinks" of the Southerner, and the ladies ambitious of distinction.

The London Saturday Review, reviewing a recent work on the early Quakers of England, says:

> "It contains a poem, by the 'American poet, Whittier,' called 'Barclay of Ury," which, if it is not to be found elsewhere, would alone make the 'Fells of Swarthmoor' a book worth having. Notwithstanding one or two eccentricities arising from a peculiar metre, we cannot help setting it down as one of the noblest ballads in the English language."

A Boston correspondent of a morning contemporary describes the bronze statue of Franklin, by Greenough, as "a smirking, little, pot-bellied fop, and not Franklin at all." It seems the thing tumbled over lately, in consequence of "the protruding paunch, which had long defied the laws of gravity."

Gen. Lee, in answer to the inquiry, whether he thought any change had come over the minds of his soldiers since the close of the war, is reported to have said:

> "I cannot answer for my soldiers; I can answer for myself only. I have not changed my opinions. I thought that I was right; I think so still."

Beverly Tucker and George N. Sanders have ceased to be of the slightest importance to anybody since the reward for their arrest has been withdrawn by the Government. We expect next to hear of them in Washington, claiming "pardon," on the ground of having been original Union men. Perhaps, on that occasion, Tucker will make good his Liverpool Consulate defalcation, and Sanders his little deficiency in the naval agency accounts.

There has been a local outbreak in the island of Jamaica, arising out of certain land-laws, which the organs of the defunct rebellion have sought to represent as "a negro insurrection," with the evident purpose of intimating that our own country may expect similar afflictions. The outbreak was put down with merciless severity, through the summary action of courts-martial. At latest dates, upwards of fifteen hundred of the participants in the affair, male and female, had been hung, and among them a considerable number of white men, and men of means. The affair had no political significance. Originating as a riot, it might, nevertheless, have grown to formidable dimensions, had it not been promptly suppressed.

The wheat crop is very deficient in quality. The August report estimated the deficiency in quality and quantity at 26,241,698 bushels. The above table places the decrease in quantity alone at 12,172,944 bushels. The quality of the corn crop never was surpassed. That of the other crops is believed to be an average. The number of bushels in 1865 exceeds those of 1864 by 215,071,411.

The number of merchantmen captured, destroyed or bonded, by rebel and Anglo-rebel cruisers during the war, was 275, as follows: 4 steamers, 78 ships, 43 brigs, 82 barks and 68 schooners. Their aggregate tonnage was a little less than 1,000,000, or about one-fifth of the total tonnage of the United States on the ocean. The Alabama, Shenandoah and Florida, which committed most damage, were English built, English armed, and manned by Englishmen.

TOWN GOSSIP.

Two things have agitated New York sensibly within the last week. Firstly, a great storm and flood, and secondly, Gen. Grant.

In the first case the waters came down, and those unfortunates living or doing business below the street, in certain localities, had sudden notice to quit. There was "water, water everywhere, and not a drop to drink," for after water has swashed and washed New York streets it is hardly eligible for such a purpose. Four days continued rain did not improve matters, and when at last the sun did shine, it had plenty of work to do in drying up.

In the midst of all this comes Gen. Grant, and in rain, rain, rain perpetually, the solid men of New York got up a reception and dinner for him, and in the midst of rain the Seventh regiment would have escorted him down Broadway to the Jersey ferry, in an open carriage for the delectation of the populace, who were of the great uninvited mass, but that the General was considerate not only to the democracy who would have stood in the rain, and the Seventh regiment that would have marched in the rain, but to himself that would have rode in the rain, and went off quietly.

Next to these excitements comes the semi-annual one of the elections. There is to be the usual scrabble for the local spoils. We are to have a new Mayor, or re-elect the old one, and new city officers, or do the same with the old ones. There is only one word of advice we have to give voters, and we trust it will not be construed into political advice, and that is for them to vote for honest men for school officers. Let them see that this is a matter of vital importance coming home to us in our homes, and touching us with our children. For the past few years the management of our public schools has been merely a political job, and as such has been a disgrace to our city. We hope the time is coming when the Augean stable is to be cleansed, and it behooves the press to act as Hercules on the occasion.

It gratifies us to inform the public, especially that portion of it that expects to keep warm this winter, that coal has fallen, that is by wholesale, $1 50 per ton. In other words, that in the great monthly sale of the article it did not fetch as much by that sum, as in the previous month's sale. How will this affect the coal yards, and the Teutonic venders who sell to our shivering population by the pail at about 200 per cent. profit?

As suggested by this, the hotel keepers are just now agitating a strike. They want to increase the price of board from $4 to $6 per day, and it may very safely be affirmed that if they want to do it they will. We cannot exactly see what the boarders are going to do to enable them to eat the the other $2 worth per diem, for taking ocular proof of it, we think that a large majority of them strain very hard now to get the worth of their money.

Last week we had something to say about bogus intelligence offices, in which the poor stranger, seeking employment, was swindled of a dollar or two, perhaps his very last, under the pretence of getting him employment. Since this the police have taken hold of one of these rascals, called Charles Gordon, alias Garton, who advertised for men to go to South Carolina, free passage, and $2 50 per day. This advertisement brought a couple of hundred men, from each of whom he got $1 50, and then attempted to get away. He was arrested, and confronted with his crowd of accusers, and is now awaiting justice in the Tombs. We think he will get it—unless he has plenty of money

The press is making continual outcry about the ferries, and our theory—and though an old one, we think it good—is, that wherever there is much smoke there must be some fire. New York city has twenty-three lines of steam ferries, and, almost without exception, they are wretchedly managed, and simply looked on, by those who have charge of them, as means of making money. They are all on leases from the city, and we hardly believe that any sane person will believe anything else than that some way these leases are nothing else but gigantic jobs to line the pockets of somebody in office. Five of these ferries, Hamilton, South, Fulton, Wall, and Catherine, are in the hands of one company, called the Union Ferry Company, and pay for the privilege of taking the public pennies, $103,000 per annum. During the past year this company is counted to have ferried over forty millions of people. There is no denying that this ferry, as well as that plying to Jersey City, use splendid boats, and are constantly adding new ones, but still the recklessness and disrespect for safety and comfort, more than overbalance these advantages. The boats are large, larger than, according to the opinion of experienced pilots, can be navigated on our crowded rivers with safety, and yet they declare that smaller ones cannot be used and accommodate the travel.

The Jersey City Ferry endeavors to run its boats on time, and has undoubted fine boats to run, but the rush and crush at their New York landing, makes a passage as perilous as crossing Broadway, and we do not know that there is any greater risk for human life than this. Some of these boats have cost each $100,000, and are as gorgeous as they can be made for such travel.

Besides these the small outside lines are worthy attention. In some of them we wonder where they have obtained the antediluvian boats that crawl their way over the various waters. We have a theory that some of them are the originals of steam navigation, and that they are intended to last for ever, and will. On the Hurlgate Ferry, for instance, they have a wreck regularly about once a week, and yet the noble craft, which certainly cannot be over a 100 years old, turns up again, safe and sound, and is good for one more turn. In fact our ferries are real institutions, and without them we do not know what we would do, or what the coroners would do.

Our dissertation, a week or two ago, on Fifth Avenue has brought forth several letters, some upon one side of the question and some upon another. We are neutral, and only offer this opinion; that New York has reached a point in extravagance and luxuriance that cannot be equaled by any city on the face of the earth.

One illustration is in the interior of our houses. Some ill-natured persons pretend to say that we starve ourselves to furnish our backs and our houses, but, we believe this only to be the case in the demi-monde, or that class who are anxious to make a show upon no income.

Among our monied class the case is only so far different as this. Each pulls against the other to outshine. The millionaire runs up a gorgeous palace and fills it with gorgeous furniture. The merchant or man in middle life, sees and admires, and feels that he ought to have the same, and the same he will have, though he ruin himself in getting it. The result of this emulation courses through every phase of society, and results in dissipation and fast living. A young man cannot marry because he feels that he cannot take a wife out of his sphere, and he cannot afford to take one in it, and the result is celibacy and old maids. Of course where wealth is really brought to bear, every imaginable comfort and luxury is combined in living, but much more is turned to display. Of course this goes largely into the pockets of the working class, but it must be considered that they are not increased in their prosperity in proportion to the increase in luxury and extravagance. In truth, just now, the working classes were never worse off. The example they have before their eyes is bad, and is calculated to lead to discontent, idleness and crime.

"Luxury begets dissipation, and vice, and misery; and the exhibition of profuse wealth and unnecessary magnificence, in a country like ours, engenders public corruption and private covetousness.

"When emulation in display exists in different classes of society, it is to be feared that the end will come only by general bankruptcy and ruin. Where money is regarded and sought only for the gratification of extravagant tastes, and used to excite rivalry in display, the result must be disastrous; and when people are estimated merely according to their exhibition of wealth, and not for personal excellence or intelligence, the tone of social life must rapidly deteriorate."

So says a known writer, and we fear he is right.

This week we have little to chronicle among the theatres. Wallacks has produced a new play entitled, "Lost in London," with Mr. J. W. Wallack to do the principal character. It has been a success, and next week we shall give a summary of that success.

Barnum has done the circus business with a full rush and a perfect satisfaction.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A correspondent of the Prairie Farmer supplies the following: "I have a brownish-white hen, with the feathers about the neck slightly pencilled in gold color, and her head decorated with a small crest. A month or so since, she desired to set; I tried for a week or so to break her off the notion, having no eggs I cared about putting under her; but she seemed so determined that I obtained 11 eggs of the Poland variety, and gave them to her. When she came off to feed next day, I discovered a large buff egg in her nest; I then marked the Poland eggs and shut the other fowls out, suspecting them of intrusion. Next day I found another egg, and so on for 15 days, Miss Biddie continuing to furnish her one egg daily. At the proper time she came off with 11 chickens. They are now nearly a week old, and lively as crickets. If Mr. Bement, or any other man, who is a fancier of fancy poultry, can produce anything to beat this uncommon barn-yard fowl, I should like to know it."

The Adrian, Mich., Expositor relates the following incident: "A little girl about two years old, and a diminutive little thing at that, while playing with her brother, by some unaccountable accident fell into a well, about 30 feet to the water. The boy gave the alarm, and the mother running out, discovered her little darling floating on the water. The bucket was down (it probably went with the child), and the mother, instead of wasting her energies in fruitless screams, caught the rope and swung back the bucket partially under the child. The little hands grasped the pail, and it was drawn to the top and rescued by the terrified but courageous parent. During its perilous journey out, it looked up, and several times called out, 'Mamma, mamma.' A more thrilling peril and rescue seldom occurs, and, indeed, the whole thing is next to miraculous, but the facts are beyond cavil."

—— John Van Buren paid a great compliment to the "unwashed democracy," the other day, in a speech in New York, by saying that he had occasion, recently, to subpœna 40 persons, 30 of whom were compelled to make their mark because they could not write their names; and he triumphantly ejaculated, "Knox has always been a good Democratic county." Most of his audience, inhabitants of the Five Points, applauded this statement of the waggish "Prince."

—— Just before Wirz was led out to die, one of the clerks presented him with an autograph book, and asked him to give his name. He did so, and wrote in a clear, plain hand, the following: "Old Capitol Prison, Nov. 10, 1865. Henry Wirz, Captain and A. A. G., C. S. A.," and remarked, "There, that is the last signature I shall ever make." He made all the punctuation marks with as much care as though it was to stand for all time, something to be proud of.

—— The Richmond Republic says: "Slavery is dead —hostility to the Union is dead—and the principal leaders of the secession movement are exceedingly dead; and the people of the South want only real peace and the protection of civil government." This is the best thing from that source since the suppression.

—— The Salt Lake Vedette says: "The old boy boiled over, on Sunday, in the Bowery. He damned and defied the soldiers and the Government, and the Gentiles too, till the whole audience got excited and hallooed out 'h'amen.' Evidently he is getting desperate or getting doted."

—— Lieut.-Col. A. C. Hampton reports that the lives lost at Andersonville by starvation and cruelty, outnumbers the killed and wounded in the British army in all the great battles of the Peninsular war, and at the battle of New Orleans. The report could not be received in evidence at the Wirz trial on account of its being closed when the colonel reached Washington.

—— It is believed that gold has been discovered on the farm of Abiatha Keene, in Leeds, Me. The story goes that ores supposed to be gold, were found in the crop of a duck, and that on digging in a gulch which the duck had frequented, specimens of similar ore were found. The ores were sent to Prof. Haynes, Boston, and pronounced to be gold.

—— Mr. Harris, of New Orleans, walked from Monday night, at seven o'clock, until Friday night, at 11 o'clock—100 consecutive hours—without stopping to rest, eat or sleep. He walked for a wager, and won it. We do not learn whether he was refreshed by the exercise.

—— Wives are greatly in demand in the neighorhood of the Rocky Mountains. A healthy woman will bring any price in that region. The bachelors have grown desperate and ragged, and they have determined to perish or marry.

—— Gen. Kilpatrick had the audacity to say that he believed the 150,000 negroes in the war, had done more to save the country than all the copperheads of the North.

—— An attempt at a stupendous fraud on the Government has been made, but was unsuccessful. The facts are these. In the early part of the current month, the accounting officer of the Treasury was informed that a proposition had been made to a claim-agent to furnish him with valid claims against the U. S. Government for arrears of soldiers' pay and bounty to the extent of $500,000, and to allow the agent 50 per cent. of the whole collection; but he, being an honest man, consulted the accounting officer on the subject, and he was placed in the track by the advice given him, "to take all the papers that came, and to make limited advances on them." Thus he acted. The frauds were fixed, and a clerk in the second auditor's office, named Dreeson, who had the recording of these claims, also an outside accomplice, named Lake, were arrested on Friday.

—— An intelligent contraband came to the Freedmen's Bureau, in one of the Southern States, for a pass for his wife. "What is her name" inquired the attendant. Contraband scratched his head in deep thought, but finally said, slowly raising his eyes, "Dos n't ezackly know, massa—can't 'member." "Is it Abraham?" inquired the attendant. Contraband stared at him. "Is it Moses?" "Stop dare, massa—'pears to me dat's him—Abam-Moses!" said the contraband. "Pshaw," said the attendant, who all the time knew her name, "listen. Is it Liza, Julia, Sal, Lib, Nora, Virginia Blossom "—"Wirginna Blossom; she's um." The pass was made out at once.

—— The St. Paul Press describes the late execution at Fort Snelling of the two Indians, Tah-ta-chanmanne, alias Medicine Bottle, and Shakopee, alias Little Six, sentenced upon the charge of participating in the massacre of 1852. Their apparent indifference to the fate which awaited them, was truly astonishing. They sat and smoked away at their pipes as though their days on earth were unnumbered. On their bodies being cut down, a yell went up from the crowd, and such expressions as "How are you, Pennsylvania Quakers," "how are you, Massachusetts philanthropists," and other like exclamations could be heard on every side.

—— A good-natured ex-rebel soldier, writes to the editor of a paper in North Carolina: "Like you, I am a Southerner—my home was in the South, my friends, my interests were all there, and being assured that I was right, I entered the army. The logic of cold iron, condensed into 10-inch shells, and other convenient forms for administering, has proved the contrary; having nothing more persuasive than they, I acquiesce; have taken the oath, and [sudden change or not] intend to keep it."

—— A Baptist clergyman in Brooklyn, recently declined to solemnize the rite of marriage between one of his fold and an "unbeliever."

—— A Jackson, Miss., paper, makes a proposition to raise a fund of half a million dollars by the contributions exclusively of soldiers who served in the rebel army, to purchase Jeff Davis a residence in some foreign country—after he is pardoned and liberated. Each private soldier is to give a dollar, and those who were commissioned officers, will be allowed to contribute at their discretion.

—— A panorama of the streets of Boston, gotten up under the supervision of a late member of the Boston police, is the present art feature at the "hub." The basis of the panorama is the life of a young man, subjected to, and falling by city temptations, his track, step by step, traced on the canvas, affording a salutary moral lesson.

—— A coroner in Arkansas, of the Dogberry persuasion, after empanneling his jury, said: "Now, gentlemen, you are to determine whether the deceased came to his death by accidence, by incidence, or by incendiary." The verdict was that "the deceased came to his death by accidence, in the shape of a bowie-knife."

—— A man in Providence, R. I., deposited $1,000 for safe keeping in an old stove, long unused. He was unexpectedly called away from home last week, and while he was away, a fire was kindled in the stove, and the hard earnings of years "ended in smoke."

—— Already nearly 3,000 applications are on file for the 453 vacant lieutenancies in the regular army, to be filled by appointment of volunteer officers who have seen two years' service.

—— There is a dancing-master in Boston, who has for pupils the grandchildren of some of his early scholars.

—— There are now less than 5,000 sick in Government hospitals. Eight months ago there were over 100,000.

Foreign.—The recent subsidence of the waters of the Seine, France, has revealed a number of curiosities lying in its muddy bed. Among other things, a double faced seal, engraved with the arms of Catharine de Medicis, was picked up beneath the Pont Neuf, and near the Ile de la Cite was found a large hatchet of black polished stone, of a singular make. The most curious discovery was, however, a small copper case, containing a portrait of Mdlle. de la Valliere, painted in oil on metal. This work of art, which had remained for a century and a half at the bottom of the river, has undergone but little alteration; the carmine only had turned black.

—— During the recent visit of the French Empress to the Paris hospitals one of the sick, whose sight was, perhaps, dimmed by his condition, replied to a question of the Empress, "Yes, my sister." "My friend," said the sister, "it is not I who spoke to you; it is the Empress." "Do not take back the word," said the Empress, quickly, "it is the finest name that could be given me."

—— Lord Palmerston used to tell this anecdote of himself: "When I was a young man, the Duke of Wellington made an appointment with me at half-past seven in the morning, and some one asked me, 'Why, Palmerston, how will you keep that engagement?' 'Oh,' I said, 'of course the easiest thing in the world. I shall keep it the last thing before I go to bed.'"

—— A peculiar accident occurred in England recently. Three gentlemen riding in a "dog-cart" in the country met an acquaintance who was hunting, to salute whom they raised the "tally ho." The horse they were driving had been a hunter, and on hearing the cry he started off at full speed, jumping a ditch, and throwing the gentlemen from the cart. One of the occupants was instantly killed, and the others seriously injured.

—— The Sultan of Turkey has intimated to the Grand Vizier his intention to contribute 60,000 francs a month during the winter towards the support of the most destitute of the sufferers from the late fire. This sum was to have been expended on the Palace of Tohirigan. The Bey of Tunis has also notified his intention to bear the cost of rebuilding in stone 75 of the burnt down houses. The expected ordinance has also been issued forbidding for the future the building of wooden houses in any of the chief thoroughfares of the capital.

—— According to the Paris Patrie, the Emperor Maximilian, in order to recompense the Indian tribes of Sonora for the courage and devotedness which they showed in upholding his cause, has decided that 50 young boys belonging to the "notables" of those tribes shall be brought up and educated in the city of Mexico at his expense, and that the six who prove that they possess most diligence and capacity shall be sent to Europe to receive there, up to the age of 18 years, a more finished education.

—— The young King of Bavaria is suffering from a disease of the right foot, said to have been brought on by too rapid growth. He has to be carried in a litter up the stairs leading to his apartments, and has been ordered out of Munich by his physicians, to remain for some weeks at his residence in the mountains. He enjoys perfect health in every other respect.

—— Dr. Livingston was at Bombay at last accounts, arranging for another exploration into the interior of Africa. The scene of his explorations will be that tract of territory extending between the region which he has already explored and that discovered by Capt. Speke.

—— It is said that Sir Frederick Bruce, the British minister, will be selected as umpire by the joint commission to adjust the claims between the United States and the Columbian Government.

—— A miser aged 81, has just died at Gandenzorf, near Vienna. He leaves nearly 2,000,000 francs to the Pope.

—— An experiment, tried by an eminent physician of St. Petersburg, during the prevalence of the epidemic there, several years ago, serves to illustrate the influence of the mind upon the body. He obtained of the authorities two criminals who had been condemned to death, to do with them as he thought fit. One of these convicts was made to sleep on a bed, on which, as he was told, a man died with the cholera but the night before, which was not the fact. After a restless night, the criminal was taken with all the symptoms of cholera, and died of that diease, declaring that he had caught it from that bed—a victim to his own fears. The other was made to sleep on a bed wherein a man had died a few hours previously of the fatal disease. This fact, however, was unknown to the occupant of the bed, who arose in the morning, refreshed by his sleep, remaining in perfect health.

—— The other day, a couple attended at St. Osyth Church, Colchester, for the purpose of being united in wedlock, the Rev. Mr. Agassiz, of Great Clacton, being present to officiate. All went well, until the clergyman required the bridegroom to repeat after him the words, "I——, take—— to be my wedded wife, * * * for better, or worse," &c., when, with ill-timed levity, he altered the formula to, "I'll take her for better, but not for worse." The reverend gentleman immediately closed the book, and quitted the church.

—— A Chinaman in San Francisco, being kicked out of the shop of a Jew, upon picking himself up, exclaimed: "You bad man; me always know you bad man; you kill Melican (American) man's Josh." The point will be understood when it's known that Josh is the Chinese for God.

—— In England, it is said, 80,000,000 bushels of barley are annually made into beer. One firm sometimes uses 60,000 bushels per week, and pays $500,000 a-year for freight to one railroad company. No less than 60,000 drunkards die annually, and 20,000 persons are each year dismissed from communion for drunkenness.

—— In Morocco, a criminal never knows his sentence, or the time and mode of carrying it out. To save his feelings, he may be shot at a moment, when he is, perhaps, looking for liberty.

—— A whisky disease has been discovered, both in Ireland and Scotland. This, with the rinderpest, the pig, sheep, shrimp, oyster, fowl, and swallow disease, makes up a round number. Perhaps, however, the whisky disease ought, in all fairness, to be numbered with the swallow disease.

ART VERSUS NATURE.

Some time since, when last at Paris, I scanned closely Berton's countenance, while he was playing at the Vaudeville in "Les Diables Noirs," and I could but admit that the famous actor had created "a school" in the art of painting one's face. Berton is, in fact, the Delacroix of the poudre de riz.

Friend reader, the toilette of a leading gentleman at a Parisian theatre is a curious operation to have performed before your eyes. I know one of them, perhaps Fechter, Brindeau, Delaunay, Dumaine—never mind who! I'll not give you his name, but simply acknowledge that I was present when he "made up" for the evening. And I wondered at his patience to please the public. I will try and describe the different operations.

It is universally admitted that the human countenance, were it as regular as one of Julien's lithographs, or as charming as a carte de visite of Brady's, becomes, when on the stage, as dark, and the features as indistinct, as those of a mummy. How could a "leading lady" say to such a Rembrandt-like specimen of humanity, "I love you?" So the "leading gent" must "compose" a countenance adapted to the taste of the multitude, and a colossal operation it is to perform. Let the reader judge for himself.

To commence with, the lover washes his face with vinegar à l'eau de jasmin, to smooth the roughness of the epidermis. The technical expression for this proceeding is to "prepare one's canvass." Then the entire countenance is washed with sweet oil. Mélingue, the talented artiste, famous for his impersonification of Lagardere in "The Duke's Motto," substituted oil for the blanc de céruse, so hurtful to the complexion, formerly in such general use. Mélingue never took out a patent. After the oil comes a deep coat of starch, that adheres closely to the skin, and presents a smooth, white surface. Then the actor takes a palette, a genuine palette, the invention of Fechter. He puts brown beneath his eyes, to represent the passions that burn him like scorching coals. He puts carmine on his lips, to conceal beneath sovereign purple the "seat of smiles." Then comes vermilion, that represents modesty, when under the eyes; anger, when on the forehead; good-humor, when on the cheeks; inebriation, when on the nose; shame, when on the ears.

All the human sentiments may be found in a pot of rouge. The entire history of the stage is contained in this maxim, "Honor and perfumery."

I assisted, in person, at this metamorphosis, which Ovid forgot to describe. The whole operation lasted an hour and a quarter. How right we are to depict comedy wearing a mask.

The modern art of tattooing fascinates the public. It intrigues the fair ones in the boxes. It is dreamt of by the grisettes who build castles in the air in the fifth gallery.

But the "leading gentleman" has, throughout the entire evening, but one moment of due beatitude, whether ruddy faced in comedy or pale and fierce in tragedy—that moment when, throwing aside his borrowed beauty, he can, with impunity, after the "calls out," and the plaudits of the house, "go off" and wash his face.

HORSES AND PAVEMENTS.

We flatter ourselves that, as a people, we are fond of horses. We are also fond of saying that we are a humane people. Are we? Let us look a little into the matter, and see whether each of us, disavowing to himself any part in the great inhumanity of the day, does not judge of public sentiment by his own generous impulses. "I love the noble creatures," says one of this class; "I would rather suffer myself, than treat them with cruelty. No reprobation can be too strong for those who daily torture some of them to death, and every man I know feels exactly a I do." It is hard to press a charge against a whole population in face of individual disclaimers such as these, and perhaps, in charity, it should be modified into one of carelessness, or indifference to the horrible brutality Broadway daily witnesses, leaving it to each one to decide for himself, how much less culpable than the crime itself is the indifference to it in others.

The first necessity for a building is a good foundation, and according to the weight to be imposed must be the strength and durability of this foundation. Continuous and heavy traffic, is to a road what the weight of an edifice is to its support. The Belgian pavement that in a side street up town stands well under the rattling of milk-carts, grocers' wagons, and an occasional private carriage, would be crushed out of its place in a week if subjected to the pressure of Broadway travel. It is composed, as every one knows, of small, square stones, set close together in a bed of sand, and without regard to what the underlying bed of the road-way may be,—whether sand, clay, or rock itself. Anciently—that is, a few years ago—Broadway was paved with cobble-stones, set in sand, a form of pavement which the constant traffic speedily tore up, entailing endless expenses for repairs. Various experiments were made (in those ancient times) to ascertain the best method of paving this thoroughfare, and among them was one possessing some originality. Between Canal and Franklin streets the ground was dug out to some depth, and a layer of flags was laid down, the joints being filled with boiling pitch. Over this, if we remember aright, was a layer of rough stones and gravel, and then the pavement proper was laid, in alternate parallel lines, about four feet wide each, of smooth dressed stones and cobble-stones. The idea was, that while the wheels of the carriages would run on the smooth lines, the rough cobble-stones would prevent the horses from slipping. The experiment was valuable only as it showed the necessity of a good foundation. This peculiar parallel line pavement has long since disappeared, but the original foundation remains, and owing to this, the Belgian pavement, which is used only in that part of Broadway, shows great firmness and power of resistance.

If horses could be supposed to utter curses, a chorus of neighs would anathematize for ever the name of Russ. As we have said, Broadway suffered from continued and expensive repairs. Russ laid down the pavement called by his name, and its undoubted excellence, so far as wear and tear is concerned, arises simply from his having laid a foundation which was calculated to bear the weight it was to carry. It was composed of concrete, or hydraulic cement, of eight to ten inches in thickness, which age only hardens and improves. On this were laid blocks of blue granite, measuring, superficially, from twelve to eighteen inches in length, by eight to ten inches in width. An effort to afford some foothold for horses' feet was made by diagonal grooves on the surface, but the friction of many years has nearly worn these out. What little cavities yet remain, fill up quickly with dust, and now, Broadway pavement presents, during the day, a surface such as the greatest hater of horses only could have desired. A smooth surface, hard as ice, generally sloping from the centre to the edges, and in some parts quite flat, and, when dry and clean, polished almost to brightness by unceasing friction of wheels. It is slippery enough then. But presently come the water-carts, and, sprinkling the thin layer of dust which the most elaborate cleaning cannot altogether remove, convert it into a greasy paste which even men have to cross with wary steps, as if walking on ice, while, as to the horses, heaven pity them! No amount of care of the drivers can keep them on their feet. Down one goes, as if shot. If not stunned by the fall, the animal kicks, and drags down his companion. If the pole of the carriage is not broken, or the harness not rendered useless, after long and painful efforts the horses may be raised to their feet, bruised and injured as they are, to continue their dangerous journey. Another, and not uncommon variation of the performance, is, that the horse never rises again.

In winter, a little straw, or a blanket, is forced under the maimed and dying brute, lest he should freeze to the stones. [We have a well-authenticated instance of a horse that fell last winter in Broadway, breaking his leg, and before the animal was removed, thirty-six hours after the accident, it was frozen to death!]

A few boys stand round to watch the dying agonies. Men and women pass by with scarcely a passing glance, and the frightful scene ends, after some hours of public exposure, by the knacker's cart.

Were such occurrences rare, did they only present themselves at long intervals, once a month, or once a week, accident might be pleaded in extenuation, justification there is none; but they happen daily, hourly, and he is fortunate who, in walking down Broadway, has not his nerves unstrung by the sight of some such horrid scene as we have described. Let us not be accused of exaggeration. We have been at some pains to ascertain, as accurately as possible, the number of horses annually killed and maimed on this detestable pavement. The various lines of omnibuses have furnished us with lists of their losses, from this cause, during the past year, and they present a total of over 1,500 horses injured, rendered useless, or destroyed. To this must be added the losses incurred by private owners, by hackmen, cartmen, and others, and we believe that we are warranted in saying that, in the short distance between Union square and the Bowling Green, about two miles, eight horses, at least, are daily injured by falling on the Russ pavement, the nature of the injuries varying from serious and incurable wounds, to those resulting in death, either on the spot or within a short time, leaving out of view mere cuts and bruises. We are sorry to have to write it, but the apathy with which the public looks on this enormous amount of suffering is something incredible, but what remains still to be told is so revolting to every principle of humanity, so dishonoring to New York as a Christian city, that we think the facts have only to be made public to induce a sufficient number of our humane citizens to organize some effort to wipe out the disgrace for ever.

When an unfortunate horse falls and is abandoned, because of some fatal injury, the sufferings of the poor brute only begin. Perhaps the hip is dislocated, or one of the legs broken, or he is bleeding slowly to death, at all events, he cannot rise. Hour after hour passes; little boys—can you expect anything better of them?—amuse themselves by poking straws into his mouth. It is summer, and the flies collect in swarms to add to his agony; or it is winter, and the frost, more merciful than man, begins to numb the pain it cannot altogether end, and the owner of the animal may not kill it, to put it out of its misery. The ordinances of the city forbid such mercy; only one person may do this, the contractor, to whom we easy-going tax-payers pay $18,000 per annum, [this sum, however, includes the payment for the removal from private establishments, as well as from the streets, of dead animals and offal of all kinds], to remove such painful sights as soon as possible—"possible," in this case, meaning the pleasure and leisure of the contractor, after some formalities at the Mayor's office have been complied with, and varies from four to forty hours. After that come the executioners (modern euphuism calls them employés), with the knacker's cart. This is a machine of which the bottom part is moveable, and can be changed into a sloping platform, the end resting on the ground. At the head is a windlass, worked by a lever, and by means of a strong rope the carcass is gradually hauled on the cart and driven away. But when the animal is not yet dead from cold, hunger, or other form of suffering, it is necessary it should be killed, otherwise its struggles would render its removal dangerous to the emp—workmen!

And here comes into play an economy of material, which should entitle the contrivers to a prize in practical mechanics. The lever of the windlass is an iron bar, and this is also used to kill the animal, by knocking it on the head. Some ignorant people would take for granted that the poor dying brute was blindfolded before the coup de grace was given, but that would be mercy—would be compassion, and in the school we write of mercy and compassion do not pay. The horse, with its eyes open, and some vitality left, dodges the blow, which falls heavily on its nose or its eyes ——

The scene is too horrible—let us quit it. But though we may turn away from the sickening scene, it is still there, and any one may see for himself, daily, in Broadway, the central street of the centre of civilization in the West, all that we have written of, and worse too.

What is the remedy for this state of things? That which can be remedied the first, and the most easily, is what we have written of last. The monopoly of removing dead and dying animals from the streets must be immediately abolished. To say nothing of the absurdity of paying any one for doing that which plenty of people would pay for the right or privilege of doing, it is evidently one of those cases which a fine or penalty, to be levied on the contractor, would not touch; for if the fine for non-removal exceeded the value of the carcass, the contractor would leave it where it fell, and while you were enforcing the performance of the contract, the air would be unbearably tainted. The matter, therefore, must be turned over to our admirable police. As soon as an animal is abandoned in the streets by the owner, the police should, by telegraph, summon a proper apparatus, and have it removed from the streets. No longer time than an hour need ever elapse for the animal to encumber a thoroughfare, and there is no occasion for us to point out a merciful way of ending its sufferings.

The Russ pavement nuisance, the chief cause of these evils, is a more serious matter, as regards the pockets of the community, for in truth we see no remedy—except in doing away with it altogether. We have shown, however, that the grand requisite for a pavement, a good, firm foundation, was laid down by Russ, and still exists, for all practical purposes, uninjured, so that all we have to seek is the best form of superstructure. Our illustration shows the present arrangements of the sets of paving blocks, and another illustration shows the form of pavement laid down, a few years ago, in the Strand, in London, where the traffic is, as in Broadway, incessant. Whether the present Russ blocks could be split, so as to be relaid in this manner, is a question for experts to decide; but if not, let it, we say, in the interests of humanity and civilization, be taken up and thrown away, and let an entirely new pavement be laid down, which shall redeem us from the reproach we now incur of being, by profession, the most humane people in the world towards our horses, while in our practice we are the most cruel. Shall we ever have among us a "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals?"

ENGLISH RAILWAY CARRIAGES.

We give three illustrations of the English railway carriages, just introduced on the Old Colony Railroad, running between Boston and Fall River, being the first of their kind used in this country.

It seems strange, looking upon the elegance and comfort of these cars, that, while we are introducing them, the English are seriously meditating trying the American system of open cars. This, though, does not arise from their want of comfort, but from the fact that John Bull has had his nervous sensibilities aroused by certain outrages that have been committed in these locked cars, and by the Muller murder.

The English railway carriage is divided into compartments, so that a family, or party, traveling, can have, as it were, a room to themselves, in size according to their pocket. These apartments are elegantly fitted up, and the fare is only a small sum more than to ride in the democratic way.

We are rapidly approaching that time in the luxuriance of travel, where we shall step into our suite of rooms in New York, and have no occasion to leave them until we arrive at St. Louis or New Orleans.

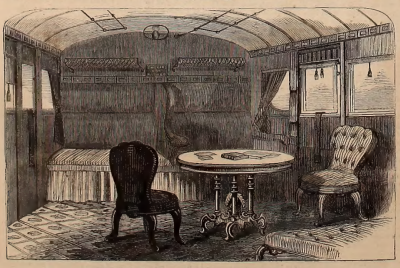
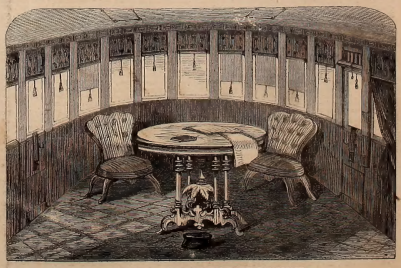
THE STONEWALL.



From the Messrs. Fredericks we have received a photograph of the notorious rebel ram Stonewall, as she lay in the harbor of Havana.

The history of this vessel is short but significant. She was built at Bordeaux, to the order of the Confederates, but before being finished was denounced by our Minister at the Court of London as an intended pirate. The French Government was undoubtedly cognizant of this truth, and, after the usual prevarication and correspondence, they allowed the builders to clear the ship from Bordeaux, under the pretence that she was sold to the Danish Government. When once clear of France, she made her way to Lisbon, where she was the cause of a difficulty between a United States vessel and one of the Portugese forts, and the Portuguese Government had to offer abject apology and amends.



From Lisbon she ran to Havana, where she was blocked in the harbor; and her commander, finding all hope gone, surrendered her to the Spanish, who, after finding we meant to have her, gave her up to this Government, we reimbursing Spain for the money obtained from her to pay off the rebel crew.

The Stonewall has since arrived at Beaufort, N. C., and bids fair yet to do the State some service.

LADIES UNDER WATER.—In Belgium, men and women, promiscuously clad, bathe together, as freely as if water were their natural element. At Blackenberg, you will see the bridegroom come forth from his boigneur, leading his bride by the hand, steadying her amid the surf. The father dips his daughters, and the most modest demoiselles in the world, from a neighboring machine, gladly avail themselves of his service. Sometimes a harmless acquaintance is struck up among the waves, to be perfected on dry land, as occasion may offer. At the baths of Pfeifer, young men and maidens, old men and children, sit in the healing waters promiscuously, while babies of wood, bearing a newspaper or a cup of coffee, are gently floated to them along the surface at their call. At Dieppe, the weather-beaten bather, with his coarse blue shirt and sunburnt hat, waits patiently for the lady issuing from her machine chamber, fancifully clad, and often wearing even her necklace and rings. He listens, with his bucket in hand, while she tells how the water is to be thrown. With one it is the head, with another the arms, chest or nape of the neck; that is first to be persued; and another stands like a rock, while pail after pail is dashed upon the small of her back. Then, if she is young, the bather gives her a lesson in swimming, and bids her rely on the motion of her arms, and leave her feet entirely to his direction, while he guides them after the semblance of a frog.

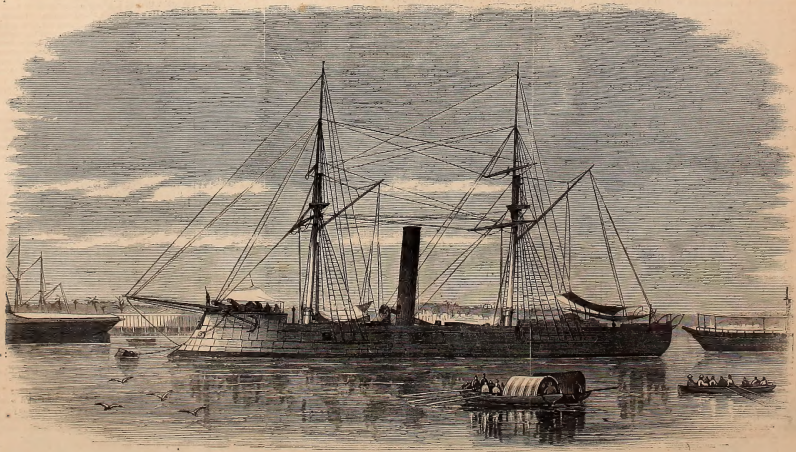
SCENE FROM THE COMEDY OF "SAM," NOW PERFORMING AT THE BROADWAY THEATRE, N. Y.—CLOSE OF THE 2D ACT.

"SAM" AT THE BROADWAY THEATRE.



IN accordance with our desire to present everything to the public that is worth their attention, we give an illustration from the closing scene of the 2nd act of "Sam," De Walden's new comedy, now performing at the Broadway Theatre.

"Sam" does not lay claim to classicality, but it purports to be such a play as public taste demands, and it is.

Mr. Chanfrau, as the Hon. Sam, a good-natured, near-sighted scion of nobility, is continually in difficulties, and getting out of them. In the sketch, Sam is, what he should be, a bloods nobleman, yet not so bloods that he is au fait to all the blandishments of the fair sex. Sam is sui generis himself alone. He is not Dundreary, yet he is Dundreary, and, in character, his brother. Broad as is the caricature that Mr. Chanfrau gives, it is not more inapropos than the great original which the New York public originally worshipped—the Dundreary of Sothern.

Miss Clive Logan, as one of the beauties of "Sam," of course adds to its attraction.

The play is now on its eighth week, and bids fair to run till spring, and, in the mean time, arrangements are being made to produce it in other cities.

THE RAM STONEWALL IN THE HARBOR OF HAVANA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY FREDRICKS.

THE THREEFOLD WEDDING DAY.

BY R. V. R.

On a ripe October morning, just after a crisp, clear frost,
When the trees upon the autumn winds, like gorgeous banners tossed;
When the nuts in the woods were dropping, for the squirrels to hide away,
And all the country gardens, with "Queen Margarets" were gay;
When the harvesting was over, through all the country side,
We kept three joyous weddings, and gave honor to each fair bride.

The first was our eldest sister, a "Margaret" flower, too,
No fresher, sweeter blossom, e'er in garden borders grew;
And no braver, blither spirit, ever laughed at frost and storm,
And we gave her to the keeping of a heart as true and warm;
With a store of hopes and blessings, showered on her bright young head,
Her marriage vows, "For better or for worse," were duly said.

Then, we saw in stalwart manhood our father take his stand,
Holding with firm and tender clasp our gentle mother's hand;
While she, in her matron beauty, could scarce have looked more fair
When she first gave her maiden heart to his protecting care;
With deeper trust in well-tried love, they their marriage vows renew,
For they are keeping a wedding day, their silver wedding, too.

But sure in her beautiful honored age, the dearest, sweetest bride,
Was grandmamma, in her high back chair, with grandpaps by her side,
With the silver curls of her soft thin hair, peeping out beneath her cap,
And the flush on her cheek almost as pure as the little one's on her lap,
As grandpaps' head, leaning on his cane, his hoary treminous head,
To kiss her wrinkled, feeble hand, with its wedding ring worn to a thread.

This was their golden wedding day, full fifty years had slept,
Since their marriage vows, so truly kept, had in fervent love been said;
While "our elder" and her bridegroom talked of a life but just begun,
They spoke of the trials and cares of the long-long life almost done.
And I heard dear grandmamma whisper, "May they dwell like us in love,
And the good Lord grant we all may meet, at the marriage feast above."

The Secret of the Siren.

A SKETCH—IN TWO PARTS.

BY CHARLES D. GARDETTE.

PART II.—CHAPTER I.

"FENNOR," said I, as, after having seen Mrs. F. and the children comfortably seated in a rear car, we went forward to enjoy a cigar and a "sequel."

"You were perfectly right, to-morrow last Tuesday that I should appreciate the conclusion of your story better after seeing your wife. Why, I have been as anxious to hear it, ever since you presented me to her, as an urchin is for the hour of departure, when his father has promised to take him to the 'show.' It has really cost me some effort, Phil, I assure you, to keep from pumping you, dozens of times, in the last three days."

"Very likely, Fred; 'men are but children of a—'"

"I mustn't, and I won't! You're all wrong! Do you—"

"How do you know what I was going to say, when you won't let me finish a single sentence? I——"

"Confound you, Burke! Do you want me to tell you my story, or are you going to tell it yourself?"

"Certainly not. I only—well, well! I won't say another word! go ahead, in the name of all the Arabian Nights!"

And "Fennor" myself as comfortably as that peculiarly uncomfortable "institution"—an American railway-car seat—would permit, "I bent an attentive ear," for the following narration:

In the last hurried words of my reply to your questions, as we left the cars last Tuesday, said Fennor, I made a slight mistake. I told you I had never seen nor heard of Glayden since he escaped from New Orleans in fifty-one, with my uncle's five thousand odd hundred dollars. I never have seen him, but I did subsequently hear of him at a very unexpected time and place, and in a very unexpected manner——

"What? He was conscience-struck, and returned you the money?"

"On the contrary, he cost me, indirectly, a cool thousand and more! But are you going to begin with your suppositions and interruptions again, Fred, or are you going to let me go on in my own way? Because, if you intend——"

"Not at all, not at all, old fellow! It was an involuntary exclamation. Propel! I'm dumb!"

On my return home, resumed Phil, I traveled part of the way with a distant connection of my family—accidentally met—who held a distinguished and lucrative position on one of the great railways of the country. His conversation, and unconscious example, determined me in the choice of a profession. I resolved to become an engineer.

I went heartily to work, accordingly, and became an engineer.

In 1854, my distinguished kinsman before mentioned, gave me an excellent position, for a young man, under him.

My uncle had died the year previous, leaving a by no means inconsiderable fortune, to be divided among a numerous family of nephews and nieces. My share amounted to ten thousand dollars. The interest of this (and salary) was my whole fortune, some sixteen hundred a year, quite enough for a young bachelor.

I remained under my relative for two years, gaining valuable knowledge and skill in my profession.

In the end of fifty-six, by my desire, and with my cousin's influence, I obtained a more lucrative and responsible position upon the great railway constructing in Brazil.

The money, however, was less an incentive to me than the desire for change, and the wish to see the tropics. I was restless, and weary of the monotony of my life in a western railroad, working and living among swamps and clearings.

Having several months of leisure, before leaving for South America, I resolved to make the engagements of social life in the great cities; not the sort of "life," however, that I had already tasted, to my shame, in St. Louis. I was older, as well as wiser. The society of intellectual and refined people was what I wanted—especially that of ladies. For although I was not a marrying man, I was not without sympathy to marriage. On the contrary, I had a dreamy idea that if I could take a clever, pretty, little Yankee wife to Rio with me, it would be a good thing to do.

So I went to New York.

A few introductions, of the right sort, speedily followed me, and I was one of the most sought-after young fellows in the city. I danced, and flirted, and opera'd, and soforthed, but I had not found the girl for Rio: when, one morning, I was enjoying an after-breakfast cigar in the sitting-room of the New York Hotel, where I lived, Courtney Tappan passed by the window, saw me, and came in.

Courtney, I must tell you, was one of the "jessamines," the dude thing, and a splendid fellow besides. I owed some of my pleasantest acquaintances in high life to him.

"Fennor, my boy!" he cried, and I caught you. I should have been here to catch you at dinner, if I had not seen you just now. I've made a discovery!"

"The deuce you have! What is it? a self-filling cigar-case? an indelible-perennial-boot varnish, warranted never to dull? or an unpublished libretto, opera of Donnizetti's?"

"Neither, but something incomparably ahead of them all."

"Even of the magic cigar-case? I doubt it!"

"You won't, when you know what it is!"

"Well, what is the phenomenon? Out with it?"

"Merely this; the most fascinatingly lovely woman I—or you either—ever saw in our lives!"

"Come, Court, draw it mild! I've seen some phenomena, you know, in my time of childhood's hour!"

"Nothing like Miss Labrie!"

"Labrie? Ah! French, eh?"

"I suppose so, though they are marked on the book, from Havana."

"On the book! What book?"

"The arrival-book of the 'Clarendon,' where they are stopping."

"They; she; you suppose; and Miss Labrie. Pray let us have the entire act. Sit down, light this cigar, and explain."

"Well, then," said Tappan, doing as he was told; "it is the simple fact as he heard from, up to this present. I was coming down Fourth avenue this morning, leisurely, as is my wont, when I met on the Fifth avenue corner I met my cousin Clara, upward bound in her carriage. She had nothing to say to me, and so, beckoned, and rode her coachman down to the next corner. While she was deeply engaged in saying her nothing, my eyes negligently wandering about, suddenly encountered a pair of the loveliest black-about twenty feet, which instantly caused them—I mean mine—to drop. In another moment, however, I slyly again, while ostensibly bidding Clara's man drive on, and had a fair look at the face, and part of the figure to which the other part of optics belonged.

"She was standing by the window of the ladies' parlor, on the first floor, not above twenty-five feet, in a direct line, from my point of vision (is that's the scientific term), and, with the morning light upon her, relieved by the dark back-ground of the interior, she made a beautiful picture. It was not so much the perfection of her beauty, either, that struck me, as its style, which was quite unusual. She was quite fair, with a stood, I could almost say nerve of a singularly brilliant blue—a blue that I never saw before in my life, except on an Indian shawl.

"How old was she, apparently?" I asked, now, as you may guess, deeply interested in his description.

"Not over eighteen, I should say. Certainly not a year older."

"Fifty-one and five are fifty-six; say sixteen and five—twenty-one!" muttered I, to myself. "Can it—impossible! And yet—she may have looked older then than she was, and I—I must! I will see for myself!" and I sprang up, and was about to leave the room.

"What's the matter? Where are you going in such a dence of a hurry?" cried Tappan, catching me by the arm.

I recollected myself at once; and said, sitting down again:

"It's of no consequence just now; I thought of something—beg your pardon, Court; go on; how did you find out her name—who she was?"

"Simply by going into the hotel, looking at the book, and asking a couple of questions of the clerk, whom I know very well."

"What were the names on the book?"

"These are the party," answered Courtney, taking a card out of his pocket; "I made a note of them on the spot."

"Madame Labrie,
"Miss Labrie, "Havana."
"and servant,

"Well," said I after reading the card, "and of what earthly use to either of us is your discovery of this tropical phœnix to be?"

"Why, hang it, man! we'll get an introduction, and if we find them the right kind of people, we'll bring them—or, at least, the damsel—out; send my cousin Clara to 'start them,' and all that, you know; do the civil by them."

"Exactly. But how are you to get the introduction?"

"Oh! I'll manage; never fear; and yours follows, as a matter of course."

"And when do you propose setting about this chivalric scheme, Court?"

"Right off. I'll meet you here at five o'clock sharp, and I bet you a bundle of 'Figaros prime,' I shall, by that time, have discovered the house and the man—and the woman, for I've a notion I shall be presented by a lady."

"I take the bet. Five sharp; and we'll dine together."

"Agreed! au revoir!"

When he was gone I sat for some time in thought. I could not determine whether to wait till five o'clock for Tappan, or to attempt to confirm or dispel my strange suspicions, by some means, in person.

At length, I resolved to know the fact, at all hazards, without further delay. I should then be better able to determine my course with regard to entering into Tappan's plan or not.

After waiting fifteen minutes more in trying to fix upon some feasible scheme for obtaining a good look at the lady of the Clarendon, and failing, I determined to "trust to luck" and my natural tact, and, throwing my cigar—and putting on hat and gloves, took a stage, rode up Broadway, walked over to Fourth avenue, and was at the identical corner in a reasonably short time.

After glancing about or two at the windows, for a glimpse such as had rewarded Courtney, but in vain, I walked resolutely into the hotel, up to the office desk, and taking out a card:

"Is Madame Labrie in?" I asked.

"I will send and see, sir," replied the clerk.

In a few moments the servant returned.

"Madame Labrie is engaged, but Miss Labrie will be happy to see the gentleman."

And with a wave of the hand the waiter prepared to show me the way.

I confess that my heart beat with unusual rapidity, and that it was with a strong desire to run madly in the opposite direction, for an instant; but by a strong effort of will I recovered myself, and, handing the card in for the now, and must go ahead"—followed the man bravely into the ladies' parlor.

There was no one there in the least resembling Tappan's description; two middle-aged ladies were sitting together in a far corner, and a young girl of some twenty years old was strumming on the piano. When I entered, she rose and went out, and in another moment the two elderly ladies followed her example.

"The lady will be here in a few minutes, sir," said the waiter, shutting the door as he went out. I was alone, I drew a long breath, and looked at myself in the pier glass. I looked flushed.

"What the devil shall I say!" thought I.

I heard a rustling behind me; I glanced in the glass again. I looked pale. I heard a door open—turned quickly round—and stood, petrified, by as strange a coincidence as ever posted me to the door, in the doorway of the mysterious den at St. Louis, six years previous.

The siren was before me!

She saw me, my amazement, and smiled.

It was the same bright, bewitching smile!

"My mother is quite unwell this morning, sir," said her voice, with extreme politeness, "and has requested me to receive you. If you have any business—or your name is of importance, and known to my mother and myself—I will be glad to see you."

My card which she held in her hand—"Mr. Fennor: you are, perhaps, probably—a friend of my poor brother's, and——"

She interrupted herself here, as if what she was about to say might be indiscreet, until she received an answer to her supposition, and looked at me with anxious inquiry. I was as yet unable to say a word.

The voice, the foreign accent, the whole person were the same, but more womanly, a little taller, not quite so fair, but the same, still the same!

I drew another long breath. Then came the reaction. I was not only ready to speak, but I had so many things to say, words came crowding to my lips, and overwhelmed me, I was even more unable to utter an intelligible sentence than ever. She saw my embarrassment, but attributing it—as I afterwards learned—to a far different cause, waited patiently for me to overcome it.

Finally, out of the chaos of my ideas, a plan of conduct shaped itself. This was neither the time nor place for an exposure, or even an explanation. I was wholly in the dark as to who and what she really was, who and what was Madame Labrie, and how and why they came to be thus traveling with the appendages of wealth, and guests in this expensive and somewhat exclusive hotel. In short, I felt that I must be cautious, and act my part, if possible, as cleverly as she was, apparently, acting hers.

This scene and situation, though long in explaining to you, had only lasted a couple of minutes in reality, before, looking her full, but not discourteously in the face, I said:

"You will excuse my hesitation. My position is so peculiar, and what I wish to say so difficult, that——"

"I can perfectly understand if, sir, I assure you," interrupted Miss Labrie, with a sad, but very sweet smile.

"The deuce you can," thought I. "Then you are a more extraordinary woman, even, than I supposed, if you understand what I can do myself!"

"Did Eugene," pursued she, "leave any——"

She again paused, and looked inquiringly at me.

"I never had the pleasure of knowing your brother—if it be whom you call Eugene," said I, calmly.

She stepped a pace backward; suddenly her face flushed, she grazed at me for an instant, with the mingled air of indignation and blank amazement, then—

"Your business is with my mother, sir, I believe; she must see you at once, as you may be able to do so to-morrow. Good-morning, sir!"

She spoke very rapidly, and before I could arrest her by word or gesture, she had opened the door, shut it behind her, and was gone.

I stood for at least five minutes, in a state of the most excitement, just where she left me, then mechanically put on my hat, walked out of the house, got into a stage and returned to my hotel, without having a single coherent idea during the whole time.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN I was once more seated in the reading-room, however, I began to recover my senses. "What next?" said I to myself. "Give it up? No, by Jove! I won't do that yet! Tell Tappan all about it? Perhaps—no! Go back to-morrow and see the mother? I don't know." Finally, I resolved to keep quiet, and hear what Tappan had to propose at dinner. Meanwhile, having nothing to do, I kept thinking about the marvelous sweetness of the mysterious siren's voice, the grace for dolce-far-niente, dignity of her figure, the unusual and peculiarly attractive style of her beauty; and the more I dwelt on these (and I confess to the life of me, I did dwelling on them), the more my vindictive feelings toward her continued to fade out of me, and to be replaced by a strange sentiment of admiration, and a sort of vague, restless anxiety, for which I couldn't in the least account, unless it arose from a fear of not being able to see her again. But the declamation to see her again grew stronger and stronger, in proportion as my desire of vengeance became less and less. I couldn't at all understand my feelings, and this made me all the more uneasy. Five o'clock came at last, and with it came Tappan.

"Hand over the Figaros," said he, gaily. "The thing is all arranged, and the first act begins day after to-morrow in all probability."

"Give us the items."

"They are few and simple. I started to hunt up all the fellows I knew that would be likely to know somebody at the Clarendon, as a premier pas, when all of a sudden I recollected, what I had altogether forgotten for the moment, that Sam Henry and his two sisters lived at that identical hotel. So I posted to Sam's office, and catechized Sam. Sam, like others had a breakfast-table and parlor acquaintance with Madame and Miss Labrie. 'No; he didn't like her style of beauty; thought the lady had the better looking of the two.' (He's a heathen about women, you know). 'Yes, of course they'd introduce me, if I asked them.' 'No, they were going out this evening.' 'Yes, to-morrow evening, too.' 'No, they'd dine in in the morning, to-morrow or next day, and make appointment with Sue or Emma to come in afternoon.' 'Yes, Labrie knows them some time, about a month, he thought.' 'No, didn't know when they were going to leave.' 'Yes, thought they spoke very good French, but spoke very good English.' 'No, they didn't seem to know anybody in the hotel, to speak of.' 'Yes, appeared to be rich.' Finally, 'What the devil did I mean, pumping him so. Did I want to run off with the girl, or what?' And so, reassuring him as to my intentions, and having obtained as much as I cared to know, I left him, and here I am, prepared to smoke No. 1 of those Figaros after dinner."

"And are you going to be introduced?"

"Of course! Shall call on the Henry girls to-morrow, and appoint the next evening, if the feminine fates are willing."

"And I?"

"Go with me, of course, that's understood. Come, let's go to dinner."

Here Tappan paused to light another cigar, and I took the opportunity of saying:

"I guess you will find it not so fantastic as you supposed, about the denouement of your story, Phil!"

"Pooh! You're forte chains out of the line!"

"But how the dickens do you know——"

"Silence! the curtain's up again!"

I obeyed, and Phil resumed.

The next day Tappan and I called on the Misses Henry, whom I had met once or twice before, and whom he knew intimately.

They were not at home.

"Confound Sam!" exclaimed Courtney, "he has never told them I was going to call."

"You didn't ask him to, did you?"

"No, of course not; but I thought he'd mention it incidentally. No matter, it's only one day's delay. We'll come again to-morrow, and leave no card this morning. Come along. Keep a sharp look out for la belle Labrie!"

As you may suppose, I did not need any such reminder. But our look out was in vain. We could see nothing of her.

The next day we called again. The Misses Henry were at home. But what was Tappan's chagrin and my rage to be told that Madame and Miss Labrie were gone!

"When? Where?"

"They sailed in the steamer for Havana this morning—not over two hours ago, in fact."

Once more I was baffled. And this time, strange to say, I felt the disappointment far more bitterly, though suffering nothing either in purse or character, than I had felt, when stripped for the time of both, six years before, in St. Louis!

A fortnight later I also sailed out of New York harbor, southward bound. I arrived duly at Rio, and entered upon my duties. For a year I was steadily at my post, but neither the novelties of the scene, the distance, nor my occupations prevented the continual recurrence of the siren's bewitching image. She haunted me under a hundred different disguises. But in none of my visions of her, now, did she seem an object of hatred or revenge. On the contrary, these illusions began to assume such pleasing forms, that I asked myself, again and again, "Good heaven, can it be possible that I love this girl—this witch, this—I know not how to call her?" And to these oft repeated self-questionings my heart gave me tokens of answer that startled me.

At the end of the year I asked, and obtained, leave of absence for a few months, to visit my friends in the United States, and also to attend to a little business of my own connected with my uncle's legacy. This business took me to New Orleans.

Thus, seven years from the period of my first visit, I saw the Crescent City for the third time. The fourth day after my arrival, having my business arranged and nothing to do, I took a walk as far as the slave-market, which I had never seen.

"Did you ever see a slave-market, Burke?" asked Fennor, interrupting himself.

"Often. In Charleston, and Mobile, too."

Then I needn't describe it for your benefit; suffice it to say it was a great sale day, and there was a "large and likely lot," as the traders in human flesh have it, being offered.

I examined, with considerable interest, the countenances and expressions of the "candidates" as they stood around "on show," till I came to one who at once arrested my earnest attention. It was a woman, a bright mulatto, with nothing peculiar about her (save the keen brilliancy of her eyes), unless it was the still more glaring colors of the handkerchief, bound round her head like a turban.

But I felt that I had seen this woman before, and a single instant's thought told me when and where. She was the cup-bearer of the siren's den (I can't help calling it a den, though it was much more like a boudoir), from whose hand I had received the deadly opiate seven years ago. I also saw that she had recognized me, in spite of my beard and darkened skin, for her eyes glittered, she smiled, and beckoned me to come closer. My first impulse was to have her instantly taken before a magistrate, and made, with the whip if necessary, to confess the secrets of that nefarious league between Glayden and her mistress, as well as their present whereabouts. But another moment's thought determined me on trying milder, and, above all—for reasons which you may divine—quieter means of obtaining the information I wanted. I approached her, therefore, and said;

"What is your name?"

"Mina. Won't you buy me, master? I'll tell you something if you'll buy me."

"Mina, come over here, in the corner, I wish to speak with you."

She followed me into a corner, out of the common ear-shot.

"Why are you being sold in this way, Mina? Where—where is your mistress?"

"Which mistress?"

"What! Have you more than one? I mean she you were with in that—in St. Louis."

Note, as I noted at the time, that Mina spoke correct English, though with a foreign accent.

"She is not my mistress now."

"But where is she?"

"Buy me, and I'll tell you, master."

"What should I do with you? I have other means of making you speak, as you know, if I——"

"You mean to have me whipped. Try it, master, and see if the whip will make me speak."

"But why not tell me, then? I mean your mistress no harm. I have forgotten and forgiven the past."

(This, I fear, was a "whopper.")

"Because—because I want you to buy me. I don't want to be sold to a stranger. I will not be sold to a stranger!" exclaimed she, fiercely.

"But how come you to be sold at all?"

"Buy me, and I'll tell you. I'll tell you where my mistress is—my other mistress, I mean. I'll tell you where Mr. Glayden is—I'll tell you why I'm sold. Buy me, and I'll tell you all. If not, nothing! Not a word!"

And she set her teeth, and looked at me in a way that convinced me no torture would wring a word from her.

I hesitated and pondered some minutes. This seemed my last chance to fathom the mystery that had so long tormented me. God knows I didn't want to buy the woman. The thing was repugnant to my feelings, and, besides, what on earth could I do with her?

But time passed; in another moment Mina's turn to mount the stand would come.

"You had better buy me," she pleaded again.

"Who has you here for sale?" I asked.

I had resolved to buy her at last, and set her free as soon as she had told me her story.

"That little thin man, there," she answered, pointing him out. "Talk sharp to him, master."

I went to him with loathing, but firmly.

"What—how much for younder woman?" I asked.

"That yaller gyurl, thar? She's a mighty valuable crittur, that. Why, mister, she can speak French, and Spanish, and English—one just as good as t'other. She's eddicated. She's wuth twelve hundred dollars, if she's wuth a cent!"

I had in my pocket two five hundred dollar bank notes. I took them out.

"Here are a thousand dollars," said I. "I will give no more."

"Put another hundred on the pile, mister, and she's yourn!"

I turned away, as if to leave him.

"Well," said he, slowly, "hold on! I don't make any commission to speak of—I don't, by ——, mister; but you're so short. Give us the papers. I'll write you a receipt in no time."

In five minutes more Mina was mine—my property! Strange, isn't it, that one man can thus—but we've no time for philosophizing, if I'm to finish before we reach Baltimore.

Mina went home with me to the hotel.

"Now," said I, "for your promise! Where is your—where is that scoundrel, Glayden?"

"He's in California, master. He's been there going on seven years."

"What! He never came back, then! Well, let him go. And, now, where's your mistress?"

"Which one, master?" she asked again, maliciously.

"Pshaw! You know. I only know of one."

"Yes, you do, master. You know them both."

"Well, perhaps I do. But I only care to know of one—the one I saw in St. Louis. Where is she?"

"Ha! ha! master! Maybe you'll care most to know where the other is, by-and-bye. But Miss Louise—she's in California with Mr. Glayden, if she isn't dead. Most likely, though, she's dead," added Mina, sadly.

"There, Mina, you are telling a falsehood. She is not in California, I know well; or, if she is——. When did she go there?"

"She went there in the next steamer after Mr. Glayden."

"That I know to be false, woman, for I have seen her myself since; not over a year ago!"

"You are mistaken, master. I swear to you, she's been with Mr. Glayden these seven years—if she ain't dead, poor child! She never came back."

"Mina, there's something about this I cannot understand; for, as sure as I stand here, I saw her in New York a year ago!'

"But I understand it all, master. I knew it before you bought me, and if you'll promise me one thing more, I'll explain it all to you."

"What is it?"

"Promise me that as soon as you know all, you will find means to send me to California. Oh! I've been longing to go these seven years, and find out if my poor child's alive or dead, though I fear she's dead! I fear she's dead! (The accent of utter sadness with which she said this was very affecting.) I've wanted to go, and couldn't. She wouldn't let me——"

"Who?"

"My mistress—my other mistress. Will you promise, master?"

"Yes; I will set you free, and send you there, if you wish it so earnestly. So, now, speak on, and quickly!"

"Bless you, master! I'll make it as short as I can. My old mistress had three children—one boy and two girls. The boy was the oldest by two years, and Miss Louise was a year older than her sister.

"Master was a French creole—he's dead, poor man!—and mistress was a Spanish creole, and we lived on a plantation of mistress's in Cuba. I was Miss Louise's nurse, and my child—she's dead, too!—was her foster-sister. I believe I loved Miss Louise the best of the two; I do, indeed. And so my own was taken away. When Miss Louise was fifteen, we all came on a visit to this country——"

"Mina!" I exclaimed impatiently, "I don't wish to hear the family history. I only want you to explain the mystery attaching to your 'Miss Louise,' that enables her to be in two places at once, and also——"

"I know, master," interrupted the woman, mildly, "and I'll come to that directly. I'll be as quick as I can, indeed. Well, then, we came to New Orleans, and in one month afterward, Miss Louise was gone. Every kind of search was made, rewards offered,—all in vain,—and we went back to Cuba in the most terrible state of despair. Indeed, poor master never held up his head again, but died three months afterward; and mistress would have died, too, only she kept up in the hopes of Miss Louise still coming back. I said we went back, master; but I didn't go back. I begged, and beseeched, on my knees, to stay and wait for my foster-child, or find her; for I was sure I should find her again, somehow, and mistress let me stay with some friends of master's here.

"Sure enough, sir, nearly a year afterwards, I found her. She was with Mr. Glayden then, sir, and told me she was his wife, and wouldn't let me send word to her poor mother (for I couldn't do anything that would offend her, or that she told me not to, for my life, master); but she let me go with her, and we went to St Louis, where you met her; and, though I knew it was very wicked, I couldn't help it. If she had told me to stab you, master, I would have done it.

"When she went after Mr. Glayden to California, she took me with her; but at Havana she ordered me to go ashore, and go home to her mother, and gave me a letter for her; and, though my heart was breaking, I went, and so lost her again."

Here Mina's feelings overcame her, and she burst into violent sobs. When somewhat calm again, she resumed:

"What was in the letter, I never knew; but mistress—her mother, I mean—told me never to breathe her name to a soul, especially to her sister, and I never did there, and we lived as before for nearly six years, when mistress's son, who was a very wild young man, went on a trip to this country, and, after leading a very wild life for a few months, he died very suddenly in New York city, and was buried there, and immediately the news came, my mistress started for New York, with——"

"Stop!" I cried, a strange light seeming to break upon me. "Tell—tell me, what was your mistress' name?"

"Madame Labrie, master."

"Good heaven!" I exclaimed; and, for a moment, I was unable to utter another word. Then, recovering myself—"Go on, quick! quick! But, no; you need not. I know all the rest. That—that strangely-bewitching girl—that image—that double of your lost—in every sense, lost—Louise—she—she was—she is only her sister! Thank God!" And I felt as if a strange load of sorrow and pain were lifted from me suddenly.

But, after a moment's thought—"But tell me," I eagerly asked, "how came you again separated? How came you here, for sale, in the public market?"

"It is my punishment for breaking my promise. On your account, in an unguarded moment, I spoke to my young mistress of her sister, to explain your strange visit, and still stranger manner; her mother overheard me, and, in spite of my tears and penitence, she doomed me to be sold to strangers. But for your coming——"

"Yes, yes!" interrupted I; "but why sell you here? Where—where are Madame Labrie and her daughter?"

"Not five streets from here, master."

"How? And you have not told me all this time! I must go instantly—instantly—and apologize for my—for my former intrusion, and—and—"

"And your promise to me, master; you won't forget that, will you?"

Poor Mina's pleading accent recalled me to a calmer sense of my position and duty; and, sitting down again, I arranged with her as to how and where she should go to seek her foster-child. Then, obtaining the address of Madame Labrie, I hastened thither.

On sending in my card, I was admitted; but, this time, to the presence of the mother.

We are drawing near Baltimore, and I must hasten the denouement.

Our interview was a long, and, in some respects, a very painful one, especially painful to Mrs. Labrie. It ended, however, in my formal introduction to her charming daughter, whom I now had the pleasure of contemplating much more at my ease. The resemblance between the sisters was certainly extraordinary; but as, in the course of time, our acquaintance ripened, (for I remained three weeks in New Orleans with them, and afterward joined them in Cuba,) I discovered many slight differences, all, in my opinion, in favor of the younger. I remained in Cuba nearly three months, and the day but one before I left to return to Rio, I received a letter from Benicia, California, saying that all poor Mina had found of her beloved, though erring foster-child was her grave!

Here we are at Baltimore, I declare! I must go and see after Cora and the children.

"Apropos, Fennor," said I, as we went through the cars, "what was your wife's maiden name?"

"Pooh! you know, now, that it was Cora Labrie; but, an hour ago, you would have sworn I had married 'The Siren.'"

THE RICH MEN OF NEW YORK.

How They Work.

No bank clerk on the salary of $1,000 a-year goes to his bank as regularly, or works so many hours as Wm. B. Astor, who counts up his $40,000,000. His little one-story office, a step or two from Broadway, on Prince street, with its iron bars, making it resemble a police prison, is the den where he performs his daily toil, and out of his wealth and labor gets only "his victuals and clothes." He attends personally to all his business, knows every dollar of rent or income that is to become due, pays every dollar, makes his entries in his own hand, and obliges his subordinates to come to him for information, while he does not go to them. He generally comes down in the omnibus at an early hour in the day, and remains closely absorbed in business until five o'clock. He rarely takes exercise, and finds his pleasure in the closest attention to business. A friend of mine rode to Washington with him in the same car from New York. He neither spoke nor got out of his seat, and hardly moved from Jersey City to Washington. He usually leaves his office at five o'clock, and walks slowly up Broadway to Lafayette place. He is over six feet high, heavily built, with a decided German look, small hazy eyes, as if he was half asleep, head round as a pumpkin, and about as destitute of hair. He is exceedingly hospitable, and in the "season" gives a dinner to his friends weekly, at which the richest viands, on services of gold and silver, are presented by liveried servants to his guests.

Commodore Vanderbilt never worked harder in his life, never worked more hours than now. He has a confidential clerk, who works like a packhorse, who has been in his employ for 30 years. Besides this, Vanderbilt does his own business, makes and executes his own contracts, and this, with the business he does on $20,000,000, is no small toil. The Commodore goes down to his business regularly every day, and can be found at certain hours. His only recreation, euchre and fast horses.

Moses Taylor, whose dividends from his coal stock alone, this year, reached the pretty little sum of $1,000,000, began business in New York when he was sixteen years of age, kept his own books with his own hands, and has done so ever since. His library, in his own house on Fifth avenue, is a regular workshop. Every night he brings up his business with his own hand. His vast business, personal to himself, and his business as trustee, are kept by himself. He makes all the original entries of sort and kind, and goes to his office for no information, and he knows just how things must be there to be right. And should every record kept by his book-keeper and clerks be destroyed, it would make no difference with him, for he has the originals in his own hands. Many merchants spend the afternoon in riding, or in games, or in the excitement in the evening stock board; but Mr. Taylor finds his recreation in a bath, a good dinner, a comfortable siesta, and an evening devoted to work. Such a man would make money and keep it.

A celebrated judge had a very stingy wife. On one occasion she received his friends in the drawing-room, with a single candle. "Be pleased, my dear," said his lordship, "to let us have a second candle, that we may see where the other stands."

FUN FOR THE FAMLIY.

Bruton, telling an anecdote of his deaf friend "ever mistaking the word," says: "I was present with him at a party, when a Cockney visitor was relating a journey he had had with a Government clerk to Primrose hill. He finished by observing, 'We had been out for a long walk, and we were both going home. The clerk lived on the other side of the hill, and I had to go on—or, rather, he had to go on and I had to go off. However, when he got to this immense raise o' ground, he left me, as he 'must cut off,' he said.'

"'And did you allow him to do it?' gasped the deaf man.

"'To do what?'

"'Why,' continued the deaf one, 'didn't you say when he came to an immense razor ground he must cut off his head?'"

A student, who was declaiming vigorously, and, as he doubtless believed, eloquently, on "The Language of Man," burst forth with:

"The indispensable contributions of the inferior members of the animal kingdom to our noble language, and——"

But here his tutor stopped him, and satirically requested an explanation of the "indispensable contributions," referred to. Whereupon the student, without being at all abashed, at once replied:

"They may be found, sir, in such words as dog-matism, cat-echism, cro-nology, pus-illanimous, duc-tility, hen-pecked, ox-ygen, cow-slip, pig-ment, as-teroid, and rat-tification.

Sir Fletcher Norton was noted for his want of courtesy. When pleading before Lord Mansfield, on some question of manorial right, he chanced to say: "My lord, I can illustrate the point in an instant, in my own person: I myself have two little manors."

The judge immediately interposed, with one of his blandest smiles: "We all know it, Sir Fletcher."

"Jack," said a gay young fellow at a ball, to his companion, "what can possibly induce those two old snuff-taking dowagers to be here to-night? I am sure they will not add, in the least, to the brilliancy of the scene."

"Pardon me," replied the other gravely, "for not agreeing with you; but, for my part, I really think that where there are so many lights of beauty, there may be some occasion for a pair of snuffers."

Sheridan had a very convenient formula for acknowledging all the new publications sent him: "Dear Sir—I have received your exquisite work, and have no doubt I shall be highly delighted—after I have read it."

An Irish lawyer addressed the court as "gentlemen," instead of "your honors." After he had concluded, a brother of the bar reminded him of his error. He immediately rose to apologize, thus: "May it please the coort—In the hate of debate, I called your honors gentlemen. I made a mistake, your honors."

One day, just as an English officer had arrived at Vienna, the Empress, knowing that he had seen a certain princess, much celebrated for her beauty, asked him if it was really true that she was the most beautiful woman he had ever seen. "I thought so yesterday," he replied.

A Frenchman cannot pronounce "ship." The word sounds "sheep" in his mouth. Seeing an ironclad, he said to a boy, "Is this a war sheep?" "No," answered the boy, "it's a ram."

A certain Yankee, who was a stranger to mirrors, and who stepped into the cabin of one of our ocean steamers, stopped in front of a large pier glass, which he took for a door, and said:

"I say, mister, when does this here boat start?"

Getting no reply from the dumb reflection before him, he again repeated:

"I say, mister, when does this here boat start?"

Incensed at the still silent figure, he broke out:

"Go to thunder, you darned, sassafras-colored, shock-headed bull-calf! You don't look as if you knew much, anyhow?"

A very fat man, for the purpose of quizzing his doctor, asked him to prescribe for a complaint, which he declared was sleeping with his mouth open.

"Sir," said the doctor, "the disease is incurable. Your skin is too short, so that when you shut your eyes your mouth opens."

One hiring a lodging, said to the landlady, "I assure you, madam, I am so much liked, that I never left a lodging but my landlady shed tears."

"Perhaps," said she, "you always went away without paying."

Mrs. Foote, mother of Aristophanes, experienced the caprice of fortune nearly as much as her son. The following laconic letters passed between them:

"Dear Sam, I am in prison."

Answer: "Dear mother, so am I."

A gentleman was speaking of the kindness of his friends in visiting him. An old aunt, in particular, visited him twice a year, and stayed six months each time.

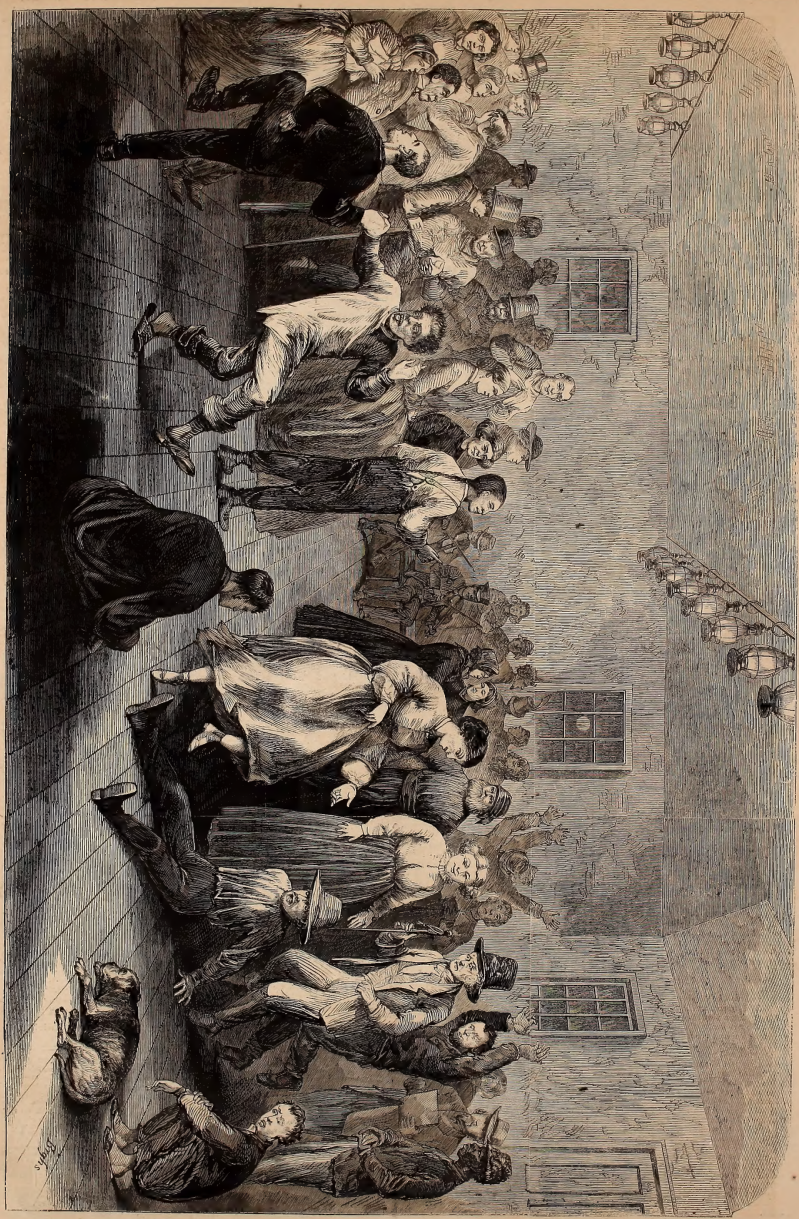
Anybody can tell you about the day rate of gold, but who, now that the evening exchange is closed, can tell you about the nitrate of silver?

"If an earthquake were to engulf England to-morrow," said Jerrold, "the English would manage to meet and dine somewhere among the rubbish, just to celebrate the event."

A little girl, after returning from church, where she saw a collection taken up for the first time, related what took place, and among other things, she said with all her childish innocence, "that a man passed around a plate that had money in it, but I didn't take any."

Counselor Cripps being on a party at Castle Martyrs, one of the company, a physician, strolled out into the churchyard. Dinner being served, and the doctor not having returned, some one expressed surprise as to where he could be gone to.

"Oh," said the counselor, "he is but just stepped out to pay a visit to some of his old patients."



When Lord Alvanley came back safe and sound from his duel with Mr. O'Connell, he astonished his hackman by giving him a guinea.

"All that, your honor," queried the Jehu, "for driving you to the wood?"

"Not a bit of it, my man," responded his lordship, "that's not for taking me out, but for bringing me back."

When is Mary not a dissyllable? When you change it into Polly-syllable.

A Queer Incident.—The Escaut. of Antwerp, relates an incident which occurred recently in the Zoological Gardens of that town. In the evening, one of the keepers, armed with a long whip, entered the large cage of the monkey tribe, for the purpose of driving them to their respective compartments. All the inmates scampered off to their cages, with the exception of one of the oldest and largest, which obstinately refused to come down from his perch, and on receiving a sharp lash with the whip, it leaped on the keeper, got astride on his shoulders, and began to scratch and bite him with great fury. The keeper beat the monkey with the handle of the whip, and would soon have got rid of him had not the other monkeys come to their companion's assistance and joined in the attack. Thus assailed, the man was obliged to cry for help, and several keepers hastened to the spot, and on their approach, the animals took to flight. The man, who was terribly scratched and bitten in twenty-three places, lost so much blood that he was obliged to keep his bed for two days.

BALL OF LUNATICS AT THE ASYLUM, BLACKWELL'S ISLAND, EAST RIVER, N. Y.

GEN. GRANT'S RECEPTION AT THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, N. Y., ON MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 20TH.

WASTING AWAY.

BY J. B. S.

Wasting away! wasting away!
Pining, alone by the shore I stray,
While the free, wild winds o'er the waters sweep,
And mock me, thus, in my sorrow deep;
For I long to flee from the fates that chain,
And free myself from my heart's deep pain!

Wasting away! wasting away!
As passes the night and the dreary day:
For the hopes, once green in my heart, are dead,
And joy like the charm of a dream is fled!
And I sigh and weep in the prison chain,
That binds my soul, and benumbs my brain!

Wasting away! wasting away!
While else is happy, and full of play,
My bosom, wild in its misery, throbs,
And my joy goes out with the flow of sobs:
For the dream of love, as in days of yore,
Will gild my lip with its bliss no more!

Wasting away! wasting away!
Oh! why did my lover leave me? say!
Was my hand too coarse, and my outward form
Too plain for a heart, that is just as warm
As though all the beauty of heaven were there,
And mine the face of an angel fair?

Wasting away! wasting away!
As locked alone, or afar I stray;
The flame that burns in my heart's deep core,
Will gnaw like a worm, till I live no more!
With nothing to quench it, and nothing to save,
But the clods, that will some day cover my grave!

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MAZE," "REUBEN'S WAR," ETC.

CHAPTER XLI.—DISTANT MUTTERINGS OF A STORM.

There is, as we have been told, on irresistible autherity, a time for everything. Dr. Pompess to-day finds it a time when his own glorification comes home to him in most seductive shapes. He has long known he is esteemed a good man, and able magistrate, and a ripe scholar. He has known all this, and been not a bit changed by it—at least not in essentials. His head may have risen to a loftier poise, his foot may have planted itself more rock-like on the ground, his rotund voice swelled to a grander note, his sentences have become a little more hammer-like in their fall, his thoughts a trifle more domineering in their scope—but that is all. He is condescension in itself to all who revere the majesty of his countenance, and no one can doubt that John Pompess always at least means to be upright in his dealings with his fellow-men, and compel them to imitate his example.

But to-day the admiration of mankind flows in upon him in a tide of such swell, and breadth, and force, that the feelings called forth are almost painful. A quarterly review, a newspaper, and a letter, all have been waiting his return from a journey into Cornwall. The Quarterly Review opens where a leaf has been folded, and he sees a most eulogistic notice of his learned work on the "Greek Particle." This he knows will be read by all his contemporaries, and he is half inclined to go off to Oxford to have some chat on the subject with the fellows of his college. The newspaper, however, is scarcely looked at before it distracts his attention. They are actually talking of him as a candidate for the county at the next election! Talking only, it is true, at present; but the doctor feels the compliment keenly, and does not so much mind whether it comes to anything more or not. He is not sure whether his is the sort of intellect to command the attention of listening senates. He has long noticed the growing deterioration of oratical taste in the British House of Commons since the days of Pitt and Burke—the doctor's great gods. But what's in the letter? Ah! this is no talk—no empty honors, at any rate. He is elected to be the chairman of the Quarter Sessions—a post coveted by the good doctor more than any other earthly dignity. Good man! he is almost overpowered by the confluence of news. He weeps, actually he weeps! Yes, there is just one tear rolling in solitary dignity down the majestic expanse of cheek.

But what is that other letter which now comes into his hands? The doctor sees the hand is that of a lady, but also of a stranger to him. He opens it, thinking the while of the little speech he will make on the first meeting of the magistrates—his speech of thanks, which must be at once touching and dignified. But what is this he sees inside the newly-opened letter, and which at once arrests his wandering thoughts, and makes him concentrate his utmost attention upon it?

"Sir,—It matters not to tell you who I am, beyond this: I am a lady whom accident brought into a position to overhear a conversation that I think you ought to be made acquainted with. Let me premise that I have not myself the remotest interest in the affair, and that I know personally none of the parties. But, sir, I have heard so much goodness of you, that I have got to feel quite a reverence for you—stranger, unworthy stranger, though I am; and I cannot bear that you should be deceived.

"I am, told, sir, that Mr. Maude—I think that is the gentleman's name, but you will set me right if I make any mistake—is paying his addresses to your daughter, and that you, sir, are looking with approval upon his advances. Very well, sir. Then I think you ought to know that I myself overheard Mr. Maude, if that be the gentleman's name—he has an elegant moustache, the party I mean—tell some friend of his—a good-looking young man, but not, I should say, so much of a gentleman as the other—I say, I overheard the owner of Rock House tell his friend or companion, whose name I don't know, that you were an ——. Pardon me, sir, I cannot write the word. My cheek burns to think of it. It seems to make me a sharer in the atrocious shamefulness of such a word, applied to such a man, and by one who aspires, it now seems, to be his son-in-law.

"I wish I could tell you—what perhaps I ought—that I am ready to testify to this personally. But forgive me; I am but a woman, and I have not the courage to venture into such a contest. Of course, the gentleman will deny what I say. But I beg you, dear and honored sir, if he does, to go to the young man to whom the foul thing was said. He can't deny it, if there be any truth in him.

"Some day, perhaps, when we may, through mutual friends, get to know each other, I may lift the veil that now conceals me from you. But I am greatly mistaken if you do not, in the meantime, recognize in this letter the sad but dutiful task of a humble but earnest and reverential

"Friend."

The doctor sat with the letter in his hand when he had finished its perusal, staring blankly out through the window, unable for some time to realize the exact nature of the communication. But as, step by step, he got through the whole of that process, his face darkened, an angry spot burned in his cheek, and something like a tremor of indignation or disgust ran through his portly frame.

He started to his feet, and was about to call his daughter, but the spots became more intense as he thought of the sort of revelation he had to make to her—as he became conscious that he dared not yet even identify the missing word to himself, much less specify it, or speculate on it, to her.

The doctor was not an imaginative man, but it is wonderful how, in great crises, one human faculty will put on the qualities of another, that ought to be, but is not, itself duly represented. So was it with Dr. Pompess. As he sat there, with this wretched letter in his hand, for a full half hour after he had opened it, he seemed to see a sudden horror overspread the whole of creation. What did it avail the triumphs of scholarship—memberships of Parliament—chairmanships of quarter sessions—if such things as this letter implied could be done beneath the sun? To him, of all men! And by one he was beginning to love and cherish!

"But who is that crossing the park towards the entrance door? Surely, Sleuth. How fortunate!"

The doctor opens the French window, waves his handkerchief to draw attention, and sees Sleuth's answering wave of the hand, and his quickened and still quickening step.

"This way, Mr. Sleuth—come in this way," says the doctor, as the panting Sleuth draws nigh, anticipating that he is about to have opened to him the exact business for which he secretly waits with so much anxiety.

They shake hands, the doctor, with his usual condescension; making the first offer, but not with the grand air that so commonly distinguishes him. Sleuth sees he is treubled, but he takes the proffered fingers, so large, and round, and white, and, perhaps, a little flabby, with the same jerky, humble, frightened manner that characterises him when in any but the most routine and familiar relations with gentlemen.

"Look at that, Mr. Sleuth! Read that, Mr. Sleuth!" says the doctor, and he hands the letter to Sleuth; and himself, not caring to see or be seen during the perusal, walks about.

Sleuth reads, and as he reads bursts out by-and-bye in a quick, indignant exclamation. No—no! He must have misread. He goes back again; but there they are, the same ugly words. At last he gives back the letter, not looking the doctor in his face, but saying:

"Shameful! shameful!"

The doctor noticed that he did not, as he had hoped he would, burst out with the words, "It is a lie!" Of course, he could not then but draw the conclusion that the statement was true.

"I suppose," said the doctor, after a little pause, during which he strove to control the growing fury which was spinging up even in his ordinarily placid bosom. "I suppose, you see the allusion to yourself?"

"Yes, sir; but I beg you take no notice of such an infamous letter."

"Stop, Mr. Sleuth!" the doctor thundered. "I don't understand that. Take no notice! Reflect, Mr. Sleuth, what that letter indicates."

"Something very bad, I dare say, Doctor Pompess; but I don't want to know anything about it. I acknowledge no such conversation as is here described. I—I deny it; yes, I do. Doctor Pompess, I deny it altogether. It is but right to my cousin Anthony that I should deny it."

Sleuth's voice dropped in a somewhat remarkable manner as he uttered the last sentence, and the effect, whether intentionally or no, was decisive.

"Hem!—hem!—hem! Yes, I understand," said the doctor. "Oh, of course you will acknowledge nothing! You are that—that person's friend!"

"Doctor Pompess, Anthony Maude is my cousin—my only friend—my benefactor!"

This was said so plaintively, that the doctor felt silenced for a minute or two. Sleuth ventured, during this pause, to glance sideways at him, but his face was so distorted, and its expression so full of anger and sense of unspeakable outrage, that Sleuth's eyes dropped, and studied the ground as a safer subject.

"Mr. Sleuth, can—can you fill the hiatus in that precious letter?"

"No, Doctor Pompess," said Sleuth, humbly and deprecatingly.

"It's a lie, sir; you can! You know it, and I know it, and he knows it!" And the doctor's heavy frame began to roll about the room, while Sleuth wished himself well through the interview. "But let me be just. Let me be just, even in such—such a fearful—hem!—hem!—hem!—in such a time as this. I beg your pardon, Mr. Sleuth, for my angry words. I understand and appreciate your behavior. As the ancients appealed from Philip drunk to Philip sober, so—hem!—to liken little things to great ones, you may, with entire reliance, appeal from John Pompess's anger and moral indignation, to John Pompess's love of impartial justice. Let the real criminal tremble. You are innocent enough. Good morning, Mr. Sleuth. I shall send the footman to you to take your orders. Pray refresh yourself. Say nothing to my daughter, if she should happen to come in while you are here. I have business of moment to attend to."

So saying, the doctor bowed gravely to Sleuth, walked with consummate dignity across the whole length of the room before Sleuth's awe-stricken eyes, then, unluckily, as he reached the mat, his foot tripped, and disturbed his balance. At the same moment one of Clarissa's poodles started from the mat, and in an instant all the long-gathering vengeance burst down on the head of the poor, unexpectant animal, in a kick, that sent the poodle sprawling several yards off in the passage, filled the house with a prolonged series of yells, and made the doctor step aside, through a passage, instead of descending the stately portico, for he feared to meet the gaze and question of his daughter, whose light step he heard coming rapidly after him.

CHAPTER XLII.—IS IT TIME?

In the middle of the sultry August afternoon, while everything in the house is drowsy and dreamy, Sleuth's soul has whispered to him:

"Is it time?"

He stands and peers down over the bannisters. All the house is sunny with the rich afternoon sunshine—sunny, silent and drowsy. Shall he go down and waken it, like a sort of fairy prince? Not with a kiss like that fairy prince. The princess of Sleuth's romance (for it has a princess) does not lie asleep in one of those hushed chambers, but she is bound by a spell—he thinks, a golden spell—which he, in going down at the right moment of time, can break, or rather take into his own hands to bind her.

Has the time come?

Doubtfully he begins to descend, and his hands, wet with the excitement that makes his cheek burn, leave their marks all along the bannisters as he goes. It never made him giddy to go down stairs before, but his head seems to reel a little now.

All the house seems to have become instinct with sudden life. The stairs creak, as if calling to one another to give warning below of some danger impending; the blinds at the staircase windows fly out and flap in the air like signals of distress; the long sunbeams cling protectingly to the stairs; and deep down, like the heart of the house throbbing in terrified expectancy, Sleuth hears the old clock ticking faster and louder, it seems to him, every stair he descends.

He cannot go on. He stops, turns, and goes slowly up to the top landing again, to think and quiet himself.

The clock strikes the half hour. It is a musical clock, and plays an old air—jaunty and tripping, and liquid—that moves one's feet in spite of one, and seems to bid one take time merrily. It moves Sleuth's feet. The fairy prince feeling returns upon him, and he cannot keep still.

Many a member of the alderman's family has come dancing down to that merry, bounding little air of the old clock's, but never has it moved such a dance as Sleuth's.

Was he not dancing down to fortune? Not climbing up to it like other men—slowly and laboriously—but dancing down to meet it—down, merrily down!

What a dance it was! Could the alderman have seen Sleuth's legs from his grave, the churchyard would have shaken with his laughter. A thought of this came over Sleuth as he stopped, giddy and flushed, in the hall.

He must be very careful, he tells himself—must make very sure the right time for action has really come. He steps softly across the hall, and looks into the dining-room. That is empty. He looks into the housekeeper's room, and pauses a moment at the door with a sneer on his face. At the table, with his back towards him, sits Esau, bending laboriously over a copy-book, and putting the finishing touch to a page full of Anthony's name. The housekeeper has gone to sleep, with her Bible on her knee, and her spectacles on her nose; and Phillis also, flushed with the heat of the afternoon, has fallen asleep in her chair. Sleuth looks at her, and passes on with a smile. Is she the princess of his romance—with a darning-needle in her fingers, and a stocking drawn over her arm? Sleuth again smiles, and goes on looking into the other rooms.

Where can Anthony be? He is not in any of the front rooms, nor in his favourite corner on the lawn. Sleuth goes out, and walks round past the back windows. The first that he passed he comes to again, for he knows Anthony is in there.

It is the window of the long drawing-room—a room that has been very little used since the alderman's death. Anthony has had the vicar shown there when he has called on him, and that is all. For himself, he has always professed to Sleuth a dislike for the splendor of its new amber curtains, its amber-satin chair-covers, and unspecked violet carpet. What can he be doing there now? Sleuth wonders. Can he see him? Yes; there he is, sitting at the table near the window, with papers spread out before him. Sleuth knows several of those papers very well. Some concern him and the gift of the alderman's house. Most conspicuous among them all are the beautifully prepared plans of Anthony's new mansion and grounds at Eddington. It soon became evident to Sleuth, as he stood watching him, that Anthony was doing nothing but lifting the papers up, one by one, and glancing over them vaguely. Presently he smiled, pushed the papers away, and leaned his elbows on the table and his head in his hands. Sleuth understood the smile and the attitude, and his eyes became riveted to Anthony's face with an absorbed and fascinated gaze. It seemed to him that that bowed head, and that face, with its tender, dreamy smile, showed him what his imagination was too feeble to show him—the depth and breadth of the happiness that, he made no manner of doubt, would before long be his. For what, he asked himself, had Anthony, that he, too, would not have when they should have changed places?

He told himself it was his happiness, and not Anthony's, that he feasted his eyes upon, and in his wild excitement he came nearer and nearer, till his form darkened the window.

Anthony looked up and saw him.

"Dick," he said, "come in."

And then he rose and approached him with outstretched hand, and moist, yearning eyes.

"I hope you have forgotten all that stupid business in your bed-chamber, as I have. One doesn't like to be kept at arm's length by people we care for, and I thought you were trying that on me—that's all. You don't think any more of it, do you?"

"No, no," said Sleuth, suddenly, as he grasped one of the offered hands.

"Why, old fellow," said Anthony, suddenly, "you look excited—pleased. Has anything happened?"

"Anthony, I have been watching you. You seemed so happy—so wonderfully happy—how could I help being pleased?"

"Watching me, have you? What did you think me like, Dick? Some old miser, gloating over his treasures? Or some bee, fattening himself on honey till he bursts?"

"I thought of nothing, Anthony, but your happiness—I could think of nothing else."

"You are so unselfish a fellow, Dick, that I could almost believe you."

He might have believed him, for he was looking on Anthony just now as an illustration of a sort of future self, and his happiness enthralled him. He had a strange, almost savage, delight in viewing, measuring, and understanding it, before snatching it from Anthony to himself: he would know all it consisted of, that he might not lose one tithe of it when it came to be his. He returned his cousin's grasp of the hand with feverish earnestness, and looked into his face, and held his hand, as if reluctant to let it go.

"Yes, Anthony, you may believe me, I rejoice with you almost as much as if your happiness were my own. And, Anthony, what fools men are, to say there is no perfect happiness on earth! Yours is perfect, is it not? Tell me, Anthony, isn't it quite perfect?"

"If it hadn't been before, Dick, you would make it so now. I didn't expect sympathy. In trouble a man may expect it; but as I have been to-day, he shuts himself up, that he may not annoy any one by the sight of his face."

"But why did you, Anthony, shut yourself up? I never had such pleasure in my life as I had just now, in looking at your face."

No wonder Anthony thought his cousin's warmth was getting the better of his sincerity. He looked at him with a smile, but Sleuth's pale eye met his glance with a bright, bold flash of truth in them, and Anthony turned sharply away from him, almost overpowered.

Sleuth sat down, still following him with greedy eyes. To be thus strengthening and increasing Anthony's happiness, he felt it no more sin than a careful heir feels it to strengthen and increase the inheritance that will shortly be his own.

"Dick," said Anthony, when he had stretched himself on the sofa near Sleuth's chair, and lay with his heels reclining on the once-dreaded amber-satin covered cushions, and his hands supporting his head at the foot. "Dick," he said, in a low voice, "do men say that there is no perfect happiness on earth, or——"

"Yes; but it's false!" cried Sleuth. "There is—there is. They only say it to make one doubt it, when one has it; but I—we won't doubt it, will we, Anthony?"

"Do you suppose I doubt it just now, Dick?"

Sleuth only heard a low, rich, half-smothered laugh follow the question, and it was music to his ear; but the one drop lying darkly on the bright amber he could not see; it would have perplexed him if he had. The overflowing of the cup, the pain of happiness, was a mystery he did not dream of, still less wish to penetrate.

"No, Anthony, I'm sure you cannot doubt it," he said; "how can you? What is there you have not got to make yours perfect? Youth—health—"

"That's right, Dick! count over all my blessings to me; I'm almost tired of counting them myself."

"Good looks!" said Sleuth, with a bright, quick glance at the mirror.

"Now you bring me down to earth."

"Fortune!"

"Ah! I rise again!"

"Love!"

"Ah! Dick!"

Sleuth was silent for a minute, repeating his last word to himself—"love!" Yes, with the other that must come! It should! He would not have half of Anthony's inheritance—of the inheritance of which Anthony had all this time cheated him—but all; yes all!

"Go on, Dick," said Anthony. "You have forgotten what I, too, forgot till you came to me just now; but now I wonder how I could have felt that all was complete without it."

"What have I forgotten, Anthony?"

"To add to the long list of my blessings, old boy, the friendship of a man who deserves them all a thousand times more than I do."

Sleuth could find no answer to this speech, either for Anthony or for himself. They were both silent for a little while, and presently Anthony said:

"No, Dick, I don't doubt the possibility of perfect happiness, as you say; how can I? but—"

"But what, Anthony?" asked Sleuth, in an awed, almost an aggrieved voice, for he did not like to have the soundness of his coming inheritance doubted—"but what, Anthony?" he repeated, anxiously bending down to look into the other's face.

"But, Dick, can it last?"

"Last?" repeated Sleuth, in a low voice, still thinking of himself, and not of Anthony; "why not?"

"I don't know, Dick, but sometimes the thought comes over me that it's too much to last."

"Too much!" repeated Sleuth, almost passionately. "Kept out of it so long, and then you say it's too much when it does come—too much to last! Taken, and bullied, and pampered like a dog, and led to expect everything, and then kicked out like a dog, with a wretched bone flung after one; and when, by one's own ex—one's own worth, one gets one's rights, it's too much, is it? Too much to last!"

Sleuth had got up, and put himself in a sort of attitude of defence behind his chair while giving vent to his uncontrollable excitement. He had scarcely got the words out of his mouth before a panic of fear seized him. He trembled, and grasped the chair, and again heard the cautious whisper, "Not yet! not yet! You are endangering all!" But then, as he gazed at Anthony, he remembered, with infinite relief, that every word he had uttered applied to Anthony's case as well as his own.

"Come, come, Dick," said Anthony, "all that's forgotten and done with. It was my own fault as much as his. Well, you think I am safe, do you, Dick—safe against any tremendous crushing turn of the wheel—any terrific downfall from my present elysium?"

And Anthony, who had risen, held out his hand, smiling as he thought of Sleuth's passionate defence of his happiness.

"You think I'm safe, Dick?"

Sleuth smothered down once more that thief within him that rose up, like the thief in the children's tale, crying, "Is it not time? let me out before you make me any fouler—let me out, and do my work!" "Not yet! not yet!" still answered Sleuth, and returned Anthony's grasp, and smiled back at him assuringly, saying in a faint voice:

"Of course I think you're safe, Anthony."

"Hollo! there's the bell, Dick," said Anthony, listening. "Hark! I'll bet you any money I know that ring."

"Do you?" asked Sleuth, faintly.

"It's the doctor's. I could swear to it. Dick, Dick, is she with him?"

"I'll go and look out of the study window," said Sleuth.

He escaped from the room, but not to look after any visitor, not to pause at any window.

"Is it time?" the voice asked him once more. He paused a minute, with his trembling hands on the desk.

"Yes," he said; "I must begin to work!"

Sleuth ran to look out, and see if Clarissa had come with the doctor, almost hoping, for secret reasons of his own, that she would be present during the next hour or two, but cunningly conscious that the quarrel between Anthony and the doctor would be more likely to progress to a dangerous point, if her influence did not interpose.

The doctor was alone; and Sleuth saw that now indeed was his time to put his hand boldly on Fortune's wheel, and cry aloud to fate, "I am henceforward master."

He did not hesitate. Instead of returning to Anthony, he made a circuitous run to get to Anthony's study. No one was there; but the blind was up. He feared to attempt what he had to do with the window so exposed. It was very hot: the sun would fade the color of the new carpet; of course nothing could be more natural than he should draw down the blind when he "happened" to come into the room. Then, veiled from every eye, Sleuth drew forth his master key, opened the desk, took out the pin that held the drawer in its place, dropped it carelessly among the papers—never again to be used, thought Sleuth, if all went well—and then the drawer was brought forth.

It was but the work of a few seconds for Sleuth's trembling fingers to take, for the last time, from its hiding-place in his breast, the codicil; open it, to be quite sure no trick had been played by unseen enemies; and then deposit it between the two bottoms.

But Sleuth restored only two of the small nails that fastened the false bottom to its place, these being the inner ones, when the drawer was replaced in the desk. And now for the test. Would the scheme work? Sleuth tilted the desk—a little, and yet a little more, till the drawer began to slide out, and as it came forth, Sleuth saw with exquisite pleasure the false bottom dropping at the unfastened end, so that no one could handle the desk in its present state without making the desired discovery—and there—yes, there was the corner of the paper just appearing, and ready to slide out.

But who was to be the discoverer? Sleuth had settled that as decidedly as all the rest. Whenever this room required to be set to rights, Mrs. Milton herself did the work, and would not let the housemaid come at all into the room. The alderman had established the rule, and Anthony maintained it. But the alderman was methodical—Anthony was not. So, instead of the regular day in each week, that had once been the custom, Anthony had got into a way of asking for it to be set to rights just when it suited him. And that habit led to another—that occasionally it was Sleuth who spoke to Mrs. Milton on the subject, and who was, of course, just as duly obeyed. All this Sleuth had carefully thought out for himself, after long study of Mrs. Milton's ways; and now, when all was ready, the trap laid, and the victims were to be caught, he called her in, and did not leave her till he saw her busily at work. Then he withdrew, to wait for the explosion, not yet knowing whether Mrs. Milton would be officious enough to do all he desired, but quite prepared, if she did not, to make her do it, while still concealing his own active participation. But as usual with all such schemes—— Let us not, however, anticipate.

As Sleuth retires from the scene of his carefully-organized plan, he hears Anthony's loud and cheerful voice cry:

"Ah, doctor, I am so glad to see you! Clarissa with you?"

And he hears the thunderous voice reply, though what it says he knows not, for the door behind the speaker is slammed to with most unseemly violence.

"Now! now! now!" murmurs Sleuth to himself, and he drew near to listen. "If—if, at one blow, and within the next hour, I strike him both ways, won't it be sublime!"

Sleuth's plan, briefly described, came to just this: to let the quarrel between the doctor and Anthony go far enough to become venomous, and then, while maintaining his own character for good faith to Anthony, to allow the discovery of the codicil to burst full upon the latter.

The first part was working beautifully. Though he himself had admitted nothing to the doctor, yet here was that pompous and irate gentleman come to confront Anthony in his home; and Sleuth felt sure he need be under no anxiety about the end of that affair—provided only the codicil was discovered immediately after.

Now, then, he must bring to an end all the schemings of the last few days and nights. The codicil must be brought forth, but also so brought as to leave not the faintest imputation on Sleuth as having helped in the process. That was vital; for if he were suspected of dealing fraudulently in any way with the document, the document itself might become useless in the eye of the law. Nor was that all. Sleuth dreaded the least discovery of his having tampered with the codicil, lest it might lead to the discovery of the murder.

He goes now to Mrs. Milton, and he pleases himself with the idea he has got a capital beginning for their talk, and for his hanging about her in the study, while she is putting it to rights.

"Well, my dear old lady——" he began, thinking to please her.

But she resented the familiarity, and said:

"'Mrs. Milton,' sir, ladies and gentlemen call me."

"Mrs. Milton, then, be it; and yet I must call you my dear Mrs. Milton. I am going to show you how much I respect you."

Mrs. Milton coughed, but whether it was with the outrageous dust she began to raise, or whether she intended it as a hint to him that she didn't want to talk, Sleuth neither knew nor cared.

"Do you know," he said, "that this is now my house?"

"What?" almost shrieked the housekeeper, now quite roused.

"Yes, this is my house, my furniture, my carriages and horses—though they ain't very good, are they?"

"Yours, Mr. Sleuth? How can that be?"

"Mine, my dear lady, my servant, my-—" "housekeeper," he was going to say, but thought he had better not. "I see you are surprised. Well, I'll tell you. It's all my cousin Anthony's doing. Isn't he generous—isn't he noble?"

The old lady's heart began to warm at last, even to this very chilling and slimy piece of humanity, as she always persisted in considering Sleuth was.

"That's like him, bless him!" she said. "I might have been sure he'd do something to make up to you for your disappointment—for I'm sure you must have been disappointed, Mr. Sleuth."

"I was; I own it to you, Mrs. Milton, with all my heart. And if Anthony had been less kind, or if I hadn't found such a home here among you all, I don't know what I should have done, I should have been so miserable."

"And he has given it to you?"

"Yes, all of it, and the land about it; and not by word of mouth, mind you, but through the lawyers. They're the boys to fix a good thing for you! Why, it's worth near ten thousand pounds!"

Mrs. Milton lifted her hands in astonishment—though she managed to embrace with her arm the while the tall broom, that dropped its head lovingly against her breast.

"And now, can't you guess what I've come here to say? Of course you can. You know that Anthony doesn't hold you in greater respect than I do, and that he doesn't give you greater wages than I will give you: and so I want you to stay with me, even though Anthony goes away to the grander house he's just going to build."

Mrs. Milton was touched by this, and by the reflection how unjust she had often been to this young man; but she did not immediately reply.

"And Phillis, you know, can stay with you, if you like," said Sleuth, in a rather faint tone, aware he was touching upon a ticklish subject; but that very remark decided her, if she had at all hesitated.

"I am sure, Mr. Sleuth, I'm very thankful—very thankful, indeed—for your great kindness to me; but I'm growing old, and I want rest; and besides, this isn't the right place for a young girl like Phillis. It was all very well while there was only the poor old gentleman in the house, but now—— No, thank you, Mr. Sleuth, we'll go back to our native place, Cumberland, as soon as you can provide yourself."

"I'm very sorry for that," said Sleuth, turning away lest she might see how his eyes were sparkling with this new and unexpected good fortune—that Phillis, without any action of his, would be removed from his path.

"Well, then," said he, "will you kindly look out for me some nice, comfortable, motherly body, to look to things for me?"

"Of course I will, and be greatly pleased, Mr. Sleuth, that you have so much confidence in me."

"By-the-bye, Mrs. Milton, I'll write down your Cumberland address," and he sat down at a little table by the window, where there was an inkstand, but no paper. "She'll think I mean something by that about Phillis," thought Sleuth to himself. But he had not sat down away from the table on which the desk was deposited for nothing.

"There's no paper here! Just look, Mrs. Milton, if my cousin's desk is open. He tells me to go to it when I want anything."

Mrs. Milton found the desk locked.

"Perhaps there's a drawer somewhere?"

"I don't like touching master's things," said Mrs. Milton shortly. "I'll fetch some paper from another room."

"Old fool!" commented Sleuth, in the bitterness of his soul, as he saw the one chance he had relied on pass away, and felt the necessity of still leaving so much to the chapter of accidents. He dared not venture another allusion of any kind to the desk. He even, at first, thought it necessary, while she was gone, to decrease the chances of her making any discovery, by pushing in the edge of the drawer flush with the rest of the desk, lest she should notice that, and connect it with his suggestion to her to handle it. But he saw he must not be too particular, so he drew it out again, and when she returned, made another attempt of a different kind.

"This table's very dusty, and Anthony's looks worse still. I suppose it's through his keeping the windows so much open, and the dirt blows in."

"I'll have the cloth off presently," said Mrs. Milton, and with that new gleam of comfort, Sleuth felt he had better be content. She could not take the cloth off without first removing the desk. Perhaps, then, she might tilt it a little. Or, stay! Yes, he would be on the watch—as he easily could be without her knowing—and the moment he saw her lift the desk, go in, and ensure her doing something to quicken the great explosion.

Meantime, he went to listen to the progress of the dialogue between the doctor and Anthony, determined to keep watch simultaneously in both directions.

We must now go back a little, to see what occurred between that pair; and to do justice to the occasion, must begin a new chapter.

THE EAGLE'S CRAG.

THE beautiful island of Arran is situated at the mouth of the Firth of Clyde, on the west coast of Scotland. It is celebrated for the grandeur of its mountain scenery, and the picturesque beauty of its valleys. Its rich stores of mineral wealth, and abundance of its game, present great attractions to the geologist and sportsman; while, as a sea-bathing place, it is unrivaled.

At the time, however, that the following occurrence took place, Arran was neither frequented by tourist nor mineralogist. Those were not the days of steam, by means of which the access is now so easy. The passage for a sailing vessel was always tedious, and sometimes dangerous, from the nature of the coast and the eddying wind. A few families of distinction even then sought renovated health on its heath-covered mountains, and in drinking the whey from the milk of the goat, then considered a panacea for all disorders. The transit, however, involved so much trouble and expense, that comparatively few availed themselves of the privilege.

Arran's lofty mountains and towering crags possessed a sort of mysterious interest to those who could see them only at a distance. The eagle built its nest and reared its young, the sea-bird soared and screamed unnoticed by human eye, or undisturbed by the foot of man, save when some young adventurer, active as the mountain goat, periled his life and limb in scaling the precipices in pursuit of the young from the nest. It is greatly above a hundred years since the incident occurred, which I am about to relate.

On the mainland, opposite to the island, were assembled a band of reapers, on a bright and sunny morning in autumn. A boat, full of young men and women, had arrived that morning from the neighboring coast, and were busily engaged in cutting down a field of corn. The men had brought their guns, with the intention of shooting wild fowl on their return in the evening. A young married woman joined the busy throng, having first wrapped her infant, of a few months old, in her shawl, and laid it under the shelter of a stack of corn.

The song and jest went round, and they labored hard, for they were striving with each other who should first accomplish the appointed task. They took no heed that a large and formidable eagle hovered over their heads; or if they noticed it at all, it was a matter of such frequent occurrence, that it excited neither alarm nor surprise.

At length the vast bird made one fell swoop to earth, seized the sleeping babe in its talons, and then majestically rose, carrying off its prey.

Consternation seized on the spectators, and a sudden shout rent the air. In the first impulse of the moment, the men seized their guns, but the certainty of killing the child, if they fired, paralyzed their arms.

The bird seemed not insensible of the confusion it had caused. It soared for some time in the air, then lazily winged its way across the estuary to its home on the mountain crags. The reapers, in breathless haste, rushed to the boat and gave chase. Strong were the sinews, and stout the hearts of that boat's crew. Few words were spoken, but every stroke on the boiling surf told with force and purpose. A low, wailing voice, from the bow of the boat, from time to time, spoke the anguish of a mother's heart.

The way was long; fast as they flew over the briny deep, the bird of prey flew faster, till having reached its eyrie on the crag, it deposited its burden there, and rose to reconnoitre the enemy in the rear. Our trusty friends kept it continually in view, and marked where the nest was situated, two-thirds up a precipitous cliff, where neither bush nor twig existed, to enable the boldest climber to ascend.

On reaching the land, their tactics were soon formed. The younger and more active having provided themselves with a coil of rope, scrambled from rock to rock, and reached the summit by a circuitous path. The others kept the eagle in alarm by shouts and firing of guns, and thus preventing its returning to its nest. Amongst those who reached the top of the cliff, was one bold boy, who offered to peril his life in the attempt to regain the child. The rope was speedily adjusted round his body, and he was slowly and carefully let down. I cannot speak of the dangers and difficulties he encountered in his perilous undertaking amidst the jutting crags and awful precipices. They must have been numerous; but a merciful Providence conducted him in safety, and crowned him with success. A stout heart and steady arm never forsook him, till he stood with his precious burden on the cliff.

Never before or since, did Eagle Crag echo so joyful a sound, as when the young adventurer stood on terra firma, and it was ascertained that the child yet lived. She was greatly injured, and one eye was put out by the talons of the bird. She lived to be an aged woman, and when I was young, I heard the tale from the lips of an elderly lady, who, in her youth, had seen and conversed with Eagle Mary, as she was ever afterwards called, in a town on the coast of Ayrshire.

MR. C. D. GARDETTE has in press a volume of verse, entitled, "The Fire Fiend, and other poems." It will be issued, in time for the holidays, by Messrs. Bunce & Huntington, and its leading poem will be remembered, by literary men, as the paraphrase of Poe, which so successfully "sold" the American and English critics, some three or four years since.

ARMENIAN WOMEN.

IT would appear that no where is the patriarchal system carried to a greater extent than among the Armenians. During the life-time of the father, all the sons and their descendants live together in one common dwelling; and thus houses may be found which, from the number of their inhabitants, resemble bee-hives, often comprising three or four generations. All the property is held in common by the descendants of the head of the house. Brothers and sisters inherit equally, but until the death of the head, no one can possess anything separate from all the others. Until marriage, the Armenian girls go about as they like: they are unveiled, and enjoy as much freedom as they could do in European countries, flirting, love-making, and marrying to please themselves, as in more civilized lands.

But once married, and all is changed. From that time, until she bears a child, she never speaks to any one, except her husband, and then only in private. After she becomes a mother, she may speak to her mother-in-law first, and, after the lapse of certain periods, to her own mother, her sisters-in-law, and her own sisters. She is always veiled, even in her own house: she never speaks to male strangers, and she seldom or never leaves the house. Her finery, jewelry, and ornaments can be shown to those only of her own sex; and in every way her seclusion is as complete as that of the Turkish women.

On the other hand, the Armenian women seldom do any hard work; they remain at home, while their husbands labor in the fields, and they enjoy, probably on account of their acquaintance prior to marriage, much more respect and confidence from their husbands than falls to the share of the Turkish wife, who, moreover, has to divide with two or three rivals the little affection or respect which her husband deigns to bestow on her. As the Armenian woman can only talk in her own house below her breath, that none of her male relatives may hear what she says, it follows that the consequence which usually results from the residence of so many women in one house, incessant quarreling, is quite avoided. Custom, the strongest of all laws, forbidding them to speak above a whisper, a war of words could only be carried on under great difficulties; and as yet, at least, speaking on the fingers, which would likewise require a knowledge of spelling—an accomplishment very few of them possess—is not introduced to facilitate the interchange of hostilities between those ancient enemies, mothers and daughters-in-law. Yet it is not easy to realize the idea of a large family circle, in which all the ladies sit mute, only conversing among themselves in whispers.

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.—In one of the western departments of France, a man, of the name of Le Fort, accused of conspiring against the republic, was seized, and committed to prison. His wife, trembling for his fate, used every means that courage and affection could inspire to restore him to liberty; but without success. She then bought, with a sum of money, permission to pay him a single visit in his prison. At the appointed hour, she appeared before her husband, clothed in two suits of her own apparel. With the prudence of not allowing herself, at so critical a juncture, to give or receive useless demonstrations of tenderness, she hastily took off her upper suit of attire, prevailed upon her husband to put it on, and to quit the prison, leaving her in his place. Le Fort escaped, and the stratagem was not discovered till the succeeding day.

"Unhappy wretch!" cried one of the enraged committee, "what have you done?"

"My duty," she replied; "do thine!"

But, instead of beheading her, according to her expectations, the committee were so struck with her heroic reply, that they at once restored her to her husband, pardoning both.

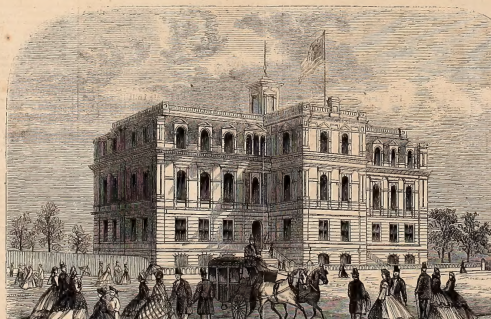
WONDERS OF NATURE.—It is a wonderful thing to look abroad over the face of nature, and see how every mineral, vegetable, and animal production is constituted so as to minister in some way to the wants of man—to see the vegetable world silently engaged in extracting mineral matters from the soil, and storing them up for man, and man, impelled by instinct, selecting these as his own proper food—to behold not only his food and drink flowing constantly to him through the ever-revolving cycle of three kingdoms, but even his most valuable ornaments presented through the same natural channel! It is more than wonderful, it is sublime, to view atom after atom of the whole creation unceasingly changing place, that man, the lord of creation, may be abundantly supplied with all his comforts and his luxuries; to see the lilies of the field, and the insects of the earth and air, living and dying for man, yielding up their lives for man's sustenance and adornment. True, "the lilies of the field take no thought for the morrow," but the unseen finger that opens their petals to the day points them out as the appropriate food to some of those animals whose life or death ministers to man! The blooming cactus not only charms the eye of man, and makes the arid desert blossom as the rose, but it furnishes food for an insect that lives upon it, and grows and dies to clothe man with the same resplendent dye.

CHINESE CHRONOLOGY.—The Chinese mode of computing time differs from ours mainly because they have never adopted our system of calendar months; theirs are the lunar months; indeed they say, first moon, second moon, and so on. In order that their years may correspond nearly with the revolutions of the seasons, they are accustomed to put in an intercalary month when necessary, and this they do by repeating one of the 12 months; and this year they are to have two fifth months. This accounts for the shifting about of their New Year's day, making it some years earlier than others. They also date letters and business documents by the year of their reigning Emperor; but that year is not measured from the day he began to reign, for if the Emperor ascended the throne in the last month of the year, what remains of that twelvemonth is reckoned his first year, and the first day of the first month of the new year begins the second year of his reign. So in reckoning the ages of children; a child born on the last day of the old year is called two years old on the morrow, or New Year's day. The Chinese also reckon by cycles of 60 years each, which cycles were established in the 61st year of the Emperor Hwang-ti, B. C. 2637; so that we are now entering the second year of the 76th cycle. Each of the 60 years has a particular designation, and this present year is called "Yut Chau."

ANCIENT DWARFS.—History has preserved the name of Conopas, who belonged to Julia, the daughter of Augustus; he was 2 feet 9 inches high. She had also a freed maid, called Andromeda, of the same diminutive proportions. Marc Anthony had a dwarf below 2 feet whom by way of irony, he called Sisyphus. Augustus exhibited in his plays a certain Lucius, who, as Suetonius relates, was born of honest parents, was less than 2 feet in height, weighed 17lbs., and had a very strong voice. Augustus caused his statue to be made, and so little did he consider the expense that the apples of the eyes were represented by precious stones. This statue, formerly in the cabinet of the kings of France, represented an ill-proportioned rickety abortion, with nothing of the air of a little adolescent, as natural dwarfs usually have. He might be supposed to be about 30 years old. Tiberius admitted a dwarf to his table, and allowed him to ask the boldest questions, which he, taking advantage of, hastened the punishment of more than one state criminal. Domitian assembled such a number of these little creatures that he formed them into a troop of miniature gladiators. Pliny says, "Marcus Varus reported that Marius Maximus and Marcus Tullius were but 2 cubits, or 2 feet 11 inches high, and yet were they both gentlemen and knights of Rome; and, in truth, we ourselves have seen their bodies, as they lie embalmed, which testify the same thing." The taste for dwarfs continued to the reign of Alexander Severus; but that prince expelled the whole race, male and female, from his court, upon which the fashion of rearing them for traffic soon ceased throughout the empire.

FERNANDO DE NORONHA, OR THUMB MOUNTAIN, THE PENAL SETTLEMENT OF THE BRAZILIAN GOVERNMENT.—FROM A SKETCH BY CAPT. W. PARKER SNOW.

FERNANDO DE NORONHA, The Penal Settlement of the Brazilian Government



Is an island, with smaller one longing to Brazil. It is about 210 miles north-east of Cape St. Rogue, the easternmost point of South America, and is in latitude 3 deg. 50 min. S., longitude 32 deg. 28 min. W.

The extent of the group is about seven miles S. W. and N. E., by not quite two miles broad. The shores are rocky, with a high surf, and occasionally, very heavy rollers.

Fernando de Noronha is 20 miles in circumference, and is remarkable for a peculiar-looking conical hill, about 1,000 feet high, the upper part of which is exceedingly steep, and on one side overhanging its base. The rock is phonolite, and it divided int> irregular columns. The whole island is covered with wood, but as the climate is dry—sometimes having no rain for two years—vegetation does not always look very fresh. Yet there are many beauties about the island. Viewed from the sea, it is very picturesque; the lofty barren peak being conspicuous from every point, while, at some elevations, great masses of the columnar rock, shaded by laurels, and ornamented by a tree covered by fine pink flowers, like those of a fox-glove, but without a single leaf, give a pleasing effect to the nearer parts of the scenery. There is good fishing all round the island, which has two harbors, neither of them, however, very safe in stormy weather.

Except by special permission from the Brazilian authorities, no woman is allowed to land on the island. Ships do not often call there, as it is considered too far west of the usual course southward, but some voyagers specially recommend it, as the more likely to ensure the benefit of the local winds along the Brazilian coast.

around it, be- months of the hottest season, and many trees and plants removed while in bloom, and a portion of these maturing the fruit the first year, it can, with truth, be called a triumph of horticulture—but such is the beauty and excellence of the climate, that almost seeming impossibilities may be accomplished. The artist says, we present it to call attention to Landscape Gardening, and the success of Summer Planting, for of all the number planted, not one per cent. was lost, although the thermometer ranged from 80 to 100 degrees during the whole time the work was progressing, and we do not believe an equally successful experiment was ever made in the United States. The success of that work can be seen by all who will visit it—the splendid growth, and the style of the grounds, and the general beauty of the residence, will amply repay a visit.

THE LINCOLN SCHOOL HOUSE. FIFTH STREET, NEAR MARKET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE LINCOLN SCHOOL HOUSE.

This elegant building has just been erected on 5th street, San Francisco, and, under the above name, dedicated to the cause of education.

The people of the Pacific coast say it is the finest building of their section, and of especially beautiful architecture.

Money spent on education is never misapplied, even though it may not be economically spent, and on this understanding, California is working with an earnestness that is well worthy commendation.

The Superintendent of the Lincoln School, is Mr. J. G. Pelton, a name well-known in the educational history of California.

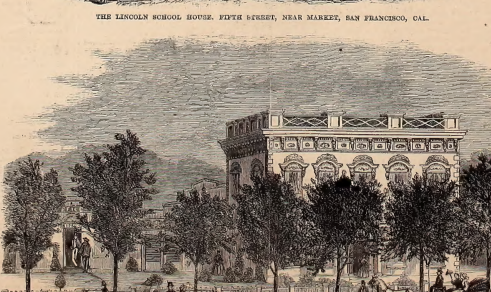
A LUNATIC'S BALL.

The 6th of this month was signalized on Blackwell's Island by a ball, given to the patients of the Insane Asylum, in honor of the completion of the first of a series of four frame buildings, recently commenced, in consequence of the overcrowded state of the institution.

The structure being but slightly furnished, afforded a fine opportunity for the free exercise of "many twinkling feet." Not a few visitors were present to enjoy the novel spectacle of a dance, in which nearly all the participants were among the most justly commiserated of the human species.

Their delusions forgotten, many of the patients whirled about in glee, which, though wild, did not exceed the bounds of common-sense propriety; others were merely roused from their apathetic state, and gazed with a slight smile upon the scene.

Although the majority of the dancers preferred original variations from the various approved figures, quadrille parties were formed which did credit to the institution.



A break-down jig seemed, however, the favorite style of showing delight at the violin's screechings and twiddlings. Some crazy people were present.

Balls are an item that has been but lately added to the list of amusements for patients in the Blackwell's Island Asylum. Music, with magic-lantern exhibitions, have hitherto been mainly employed in enlivening them, but perhaps the ball, in its power of withdrawing the mind from the fancies which oppress him, surpasses both.

THE RESIDENCE OF F. F. LOW, ESQ., Governor of California.

The engraving is the residence of the present Governor of California, and was built and is owned by the late Governor, Leland Stanford, the able and efficient President of the Central Pacific Railroad. We present it as one of the finest mansions of the State, and with all its surroundings, as fine a residence as can be found on the Pacific coast.

Three years since the gardens were destroyed by the flood of 1861-62, the water standing to the centre of the parlor windows, doing great damage. On the 6th of May, the work of restoration was commenced, the deposit by the flood having been immense, requiring the removal of some three hundred loads of debris and offensive matter, and a return of an equal amount of good soil. This, and the complete transposition and preparation of 25,000 square feet of soil, and the planting of from 700 to 800 trees, plants, and vines, required vast labor, and when it shall be remembered that this work was done from May to July, two

A barber in England, during the prevalence of the cholera, expressed his opinion to a customer on whom he was operating, that after all, the cholera was in the hair. "Then," was the answer, "you ought to be careful what brushes you use." "Oh, sir," replied the barber, hesitating, "I didn't mean the hair in the head, but the hair of the atmosphere."

THE BIRTHPLACE OF GEN. GRANT.

THIS now historical spot, given from a photograph just as it was when the illustrious general inhabited it, is situated at Point Pleasant, Clermont County, Ohio.

Point Pleasant, a town of 200 inhabitants, is on the Ohio river, 20 miles above Cincinnati, and has no further attractions, historical or otherwise, unless rocks and hills may be so considered.

Since the general's occupation nothing has been done with it except giving it a new roof. The house is now inhabited by a German family, but we suppose will soon be the property of Mr. Barnum.

GENERAL GRANT'S RECEPTION.

WE give our pictorial record of General Grant in New York; firstly, his entertainment by the fast horsemen, and secondly, by the solid men of society.

On Thursday, the 16th November, the General accepted an invitation to review the fast horses of New York, and everybody that knows horse, knows that New York can show something in that way that is not to be equaled on the face of this little planet.

The affair was to come off at what is known as Dubois' Half-Mile Track, on Harlem Lane. At 2 o'clock upon that day, Mr. Robert Bonner, with his famous $41,000 team, Lantern and Peerless, drove up to the Metropolitan Hotel, and took the General on board, and in due course set him down at Dubois', where he was received by the Manhattan Island Club and citizens generally.

Two hours before the time named for this exhibition of horse-flesh to commence, the track began to fill up. No public announcement of the affair had been made, but there would be little chance of procuring even elbow-room in the vicinity. The members of the club, and a few favored ones, were notified, who, of course, informed their friends; and hence, the attendance was quite select. At three o'clock—the hour announced for the exhibition to take place—there must have been 2,000 persons present; vehicles of every description were on hand, and a number of ladies graced the occasion with their presence. Several carriages, freighted with fair occupants, occupied the circular space on the track, and rendered the scene peculiarly enlivening. A large American flag hung suspended from the Club-House in honor of the distinguished guest.

Shortly after three o'clock, General Grant, driven by Mr. Bonner, entered the grounds, and was greeted with enthusiastic cheers. Descending from the carriage, he took a position in front of the Club-House. A chair was provided, which the General mounted, so that he could obtain a clear view of the horses' movements over the heads of the crowd. A force of police from the Thirty-second Precinct, in charge of Roundsman O'Coward, kept excellent order during the afternoon. A larger number, however, would have added much to the comfort of those in attendance.

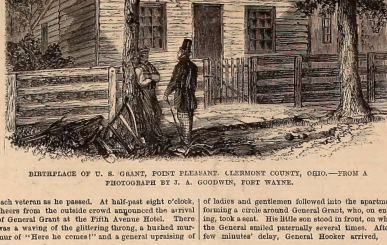
The various animals which exhibited upon the track during the afternoon, together with the names of their drivers, are as follows: Bonner's team, Peerless and Lantern, Bonner; Bonner's Auburn Horse, Bonner; Flora Temple, James McMann; Ella Sherwood, Hiram Woodruff; George Wilkes, John Cross; Commodore Vanderbilt, Dan Mace; Toronto Chief, (in saddle,) John Murphy; Battlemaid, Dan Pfifer; Dexter (in saddle), Orrin Woodruff; General Butler, Griffith Thomas; Lady Clifton, Dan Pfifer; Brunette, Harker. All these horse, with the exception of Dexter and Toronto, who went in saddle, were trotted to sheleton and road wagons.

Seven or eight horses were on the track at one time, making the scene very inspiriting. General Grant seemed to enjoy it much, and watched the horses closely as they whirled around in succession. The sight was, indeed, a novel one to all concerned. General Grant had reviewed the columns of our gallant army again and again; the clattering of thousands of cavalry, hurrying past, had sounded in his ears; but now the happy hours of peace had returned, and his fellow-citizens had called him to a different review.

From the track, we shall fly over four days, to Monday, the 20th, when the General was received at Fifth Avenue Hotel by the solid men.

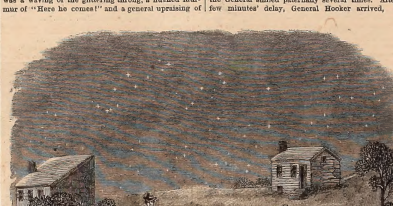
For this entertainment, 1500 tickets were issued, but those who are experts in estimating crowds, say that over 3,000 were present.

The magnificent parlors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, two dining-rooms, and the large halls leading thereto—all on the second floor—were used Monday evening upon the occasion of the reception. These apartments are particularly appropriate for such an entertainment. They are spacious, well-ventilated, and luxuriously furnished. The candelabras are numerous, and placed in positions where, when fully lighted, they throw a flood of light upon all surrounding objects. Costly carpets yielded softly to the feet of the promenaders, while gorgeous furniture and appropriate decorations, exquisitely arranged, pleased the eye, and gratified the taste.



The decorations were neat, although by no means extensive. Large national banners hung suspended around the walls, and over the entrances to the parlors and supper-rooms. Flowers were grouped at different points, lending much beauty to the decorations.

General Grant, who was a guest of the Metropolitan Hotel, was escorted from thence. About eight o'clock, Mr. Henry Clews on the part of the Reception Committee, arrived from the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and in a few minutes, the Lieutenant-General and his suitable lady descended the stairs, and entered the carriage assigned for them.



At the doors, an immense crowd awaited his egress. The utmost enthusiasm was evinced by the expectant bystanders, to which the hero responded in his usual winning manner. His old comrades cheered vociferously, and each eye lighted up with the old fire of battle as the great chieftain bowed his acknowledgments. There were six carriages provided for the General and his staff cheers being given for each veteran as he passed. At half-past eight o'clock, cheers from the outside crowd announced the arrival of General Grant at the Fifth Avenue Hotel. There was a waving of the glittering baton, a hushed murmur of "Here he comes!" and a general uprising of ladies and gentlemen followed into the apartment, forming a circle around General Grant, who, on entering, took a seat. His little son stood in front, on whom the General smiled paternally several times. After a few minutes' delay, General Hooker arrived, and, shaking hands with his distinguished superior, took a seat beside him.

heads. Two minutes more, and the Lieutenant-General enters, accompanied by his little son, and leaning upon the arm of General Prosper M. Wetmore.

On entering, General Grant met General Heintelman, with whom he shook hands cordially. The throng

From this time, until 11 o'clock, the General and Mrs. Grant went through a hand-shaking and enthusiasm-venting process, that, however fatiguing, could not have been otherwise than gratifying. At that hour, they adjourned from the reception to the banqueting-room, where forty picked guests sat down, and speeches, toasts, etc., were the order of the day. Fireworks were let off in front of the hotel, and the General showed himself on the balcony, and everything was done that could minister to the gratification of outsiders.

On Wednesday, General Grant left New York for Washington. It was intended to give him an escort through Broadway by the 7th Regiment; but, in consequence of the storm, the people did not get a glimpse of their hero of the day.

KISSING BRIDGE.

WHO is there that does not know the old saying of "taking toll." How many a maiden's bosom has fluttered and cheek flushed, if the moonlight would permit it to be seen, and how many a manly breast has heaved and his eyes danced, as they hurried over the silvery snow and approached a bridge. Toll was to be taken, a kiss stolen, or freely presented as the couple flew over the stream. We all know and revel in the custom, but how many of us know the derivation. History is somewhat silent on the subject, but our researches have put it on the original "Kissing Bridge," a simple structure at 50th street and Second Avenue, which until the year 1800 stood intact, just as it was when our grandmothers and grandfathers went out sleighing, and; wrapped in furs and blankets, did their courting and kissing, stopping at some friendly house or tavern by the way to quaff cider, eat doughnuts or crullers, and perhaps with the aid of a cracked violin had a dance.

Kissing Bridge we believe to have been the foundation of the custom, and our engraving is an accurate representation of the spot endeared to the hearts of many millions, just as it looked when the relentless hand of improvement seized it.

THE NAUTCH GIRLS OF INDIA.

MR. I. D'ISRAELI, well known as a writer and as a traveler, in all parts of the earth, gives this description of the East Indian dancing-girls:

"I was the guest of a Mr. Johnstone, an officer in one of the Nizam's regiments of infantry, whose hospitality was so unbounded, that he was always ready to bring how to and some means of entertaining me. He had just been praising the beauty and accomplishments of some dancing-girls at Aurungabad, but that he might procure a particularly good set, make due preparations, and invite some of his native friends to the nautch, he deferred it until the following night.

"Messages were accordingly sent to some of his native friends for the occasion. No people stand more upon ceremony, and are more punctilious in the observance of all forms of etiquette, than the inhabitants of Hindustan, even to the lowest classes, who bow and salute their acquaintances with much form. In the upper classes it is almost carried to an excess of politeness and reference.

"But to the dance. These dancing-girls were some of them very young, very beautiful, very fond, and possessing the finest and most delicate forms that can be imagined. Willing to please, and desirous to be admired, they neglected nothing that could set off their persons, or excite admiration in the beholders. True disciples of the Paphian Queen, still they had very few of the vices that disgrace the sisterhood in Europe. Their manners were good, their tempers mild, and their dispositions of the most affectionate kind. Druggish ness, quarreling and swearing were unknown to them, and in their habits they were temperate, docile and discreet. No vulgarity, ingratitude, or deception in their character.

"In the instrumental parts of these performances there was but little to please, and nothing to admire. The vocalists and dancers had the accompaniments of small, noisy, harsh drums, beaten with the hand and a stick. The drum was suspended from the neck, and rested on the vest of the player. They had a kind of guitar, played either with the bow or the fingers. To produce 'soft sounds,' in accordance either with the step or whirl of the dancing-girl, the musicians distorted their countenances by the most hideous grimaces. The whole neck and face appeared convulsed, the mouth wide open, and the player roared out with all his might and made a symphony to his own music. Their violent motions evinced exertion and the utmost enthusiasm in gesture, torturing, as it were, some distant sounds (as they thought) from their rude and inharmonious instruments. These performers were nervously alive to their calling, and so desirous of improving the dancing and singing, that they got into a profuse sweat, and appeared as if bewitched with the wish to please, and the overwhelming effects of their own noise, than which nothing could be more discordant or frightful, equally devoid of sweetness in the instrument, and of voice in the performers. When you could prevail on the girls to sing without the execrable accompaniment of the tom-toms, the guitar and cymbals, it was a great treat. Their voices were often mellifluous, their persons graceful, their countenances soft and expressive, their motions and attitudes classically elegant; but when those obstreperous sons of Orpheus stepped in, farewell to all harmony.

"The girls sang the strain on the old subjects, love and war, and in relating the delights of the former did not fail 'to suit the action to the word,' but they seldom overstepped the 'modesty of nature,' except urged on by imprudent and volatile young men. Round the sides of the girls were placed rows of very small silver bells; these they moved in cadence, quickly or not, according to the step or figure they were engaged in.

"There were generally three or four performers at a time, who alternately took a part in the dancing or singing, as one or other needed to get exhausted. The quick movement of the loins and hips, the whirl ing motions they took (in which our figure dancers are novices), and both hands gracefully sustained, and cheerfully flung over the head, must have been most fatiguing. They often sang at the time of dancing, and the exhilarating air, "Tara ba Tara," generally commenced the melody. Buffoons and mimics occasionally lent their drollerics as an interlude. Such dancing and singing girls as Miches, Begum, John, Hingan, and others, would not get out under a hundred rupees each per night. Their fine tresses were perfumed and adorned with fragrant flowers, their dress and ornaments were very showy, and they were full-bottomed criticals of the finest muslin, which flew out and expanded as they took their whirling evolutions.

"Our party did not break up till late, although after the first hour or two of the entertainment there was not much variety in the amusement. In the intervals of dancing and singing, lounging on couches, smoking and conversing with intelligent natives, who were eating ground on carpets, was an agreeable pastime enough."

HENRY TOLMAN & Co., of Boston, have just published a very seasonable book, entitled, "The Home Companion." He is a collector of vocal and of instrumental music, and has been selected with admirable taste and judgment.

AGENTS WANTED to sell

The Scout and Ranger,

BY CORPORAL PIKE,

Of the 4th Ohio Cavalry, an interesting and best illustrated work of the day, and thoroughly reliable. Many of the scenes in which Pike Cavalry, and the adventures with other regiments, have written to assure the publishers of the truth of the facts embodied in the narrative, and that all its strange, thrilling, and almost incredible incidents are fully supported by facts.

Such a book as this we can assure the public that they will experience a new sensation in reading, and they will experience a new connection with the secret service of this history of the war, connection with the secret service during the late rebellion, interesting to the old and young, that it is destined to be a great part of our history as a free people.

It is splendidly produced in octavo form, well bound, and splendidly embellished with 28 full page Engravings, from designs by Corporal Pike. Price $2 50. Sample copies will be sent by mail to parties desiring to engage in the sale of the work, on receipt of terms hereinafter assigned.

CALKINS & CO., 538 and 540 Broadway, N. Y., are the original Manufacturers for the above Establishment of Manufactures, which has been organized with the object of doing away with the large and enormous profits exacted from the people by robbers and wholesale dealers in Jewelry, Watches, Diamonds, &c., for which the manufacturers receive, on the average, but $2, and frequently not more than $1 or $1.50, after passing through three or four hands. This splendid list of Solid Gold Jewelry and beautiful articles of Solid Gold Jewelry—watches, silverware, &c., worth from $5 to $100 each—many of which are in this list—CALKINS & Co., managers for the association, for the present season, have determined to sell at $2 for each and every article, subject to the following regulations:

SEALED ADVERTISEMENTS of the various articles are well mixed, and when ordered are taken out indiscriminately by the blind and without regard to value, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the advertisement of the article you are to receive, which will be kept at your option to send two dollars and take the article or not, or you may take a chance. You may buy a Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our terms, and if you do not like it after you receive it, and they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the article in any jewelry store, for them we are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the least article, however low, can be sent for a gold or splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $15, or a Fifty Dollar Diamond Breastpin, Hunting, worth $60. Send 28 cents for an envelope.

Each envelope contains a correct selection of useful receipts and popular songs, worth many dollars.

Persons at a distance can have articles sent them promptly by mail, postage paid, together with the following premium gifts, according to value:

2 for 25 cts., with a beautiful Photograph worth 50 cts.
5 for $1.00 " Silver Nut Pick $1.00
11 for 2.00 " Gold Pen, Silver Ring 2.00
17 for 3.00 " Silver Fruit Knife 3.00
26 for 5.00 " Gold Pen, Pat. Case 5.00
45 for 10.00 " Gold Double Locket 10.00
80 for 15.00 " Silver Butter Dish 15.00
200 for 30.00 " Silver Hunting Watch 40.00

In all cases, upon receipt of the money, the premiums as above will be sent with the envelopes.

From the Press.

The Great Gold Gift Distribution.

We desire to caution our readers against concluding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Company, Messrs. CALKINS & CO., to be one of the arts advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser gets the promised article, but he never realizes the satisfaction up for the purpose of disposing of the fag ends of worthless stocks, from the second hand establishments of the East. Not an article is sold by Messrs. CALKINS & CO. but is worth all it is represented to be; and, indeed, the well known character and reputation of the firm is a sufficient guarantee of the proper ownership of the associates they represent. Were such not the case, would such well known firms as CALKINS & CO. invest in this city, at 83 and 85 Madison street, as they have done, over $100,000 worth of goods for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps?

Address CALKINS & CO., Managers, Headquarters, 538 and 540 Broadway, N. Y., or, if nearer, 85 South Fourth street, St. Louis, Mo., or 83 and 85 Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers Agents,
No. 167 Broadway, New York,

Announce that all of the above List will be sold for ONE DOLLAR EACH.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war in this country, and the consequent scarcity and inability of Valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been purchased for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE! Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. have been able to secure for the principal European manufacturers, have resolved upon a

to be divided according to the following regulations:

Certificates of the various articles are put into envelopes indiscriminately, and sealed. When ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, that no purchaser may know, by reading of the certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then you will have the privilege of paying or refusing to take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR CERTIFICATE.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage and making the necessary entries, which, we must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.

The Lafayette (Ind.) Daily Courier, March 18, 1865, says: "Of all the enterprises for the distribution of assortment of jewelry cannot be found on the continent that we remember to have now offer. Messrs. Arrandale & Co. occupy a high position in commercial circles as men eminently worthy of the utmost confidence and trade. Their statements may be implicitly relied upon, both as to the character of articles in their gift enterprise of disposal. Ladies especially, in all parts of the country, are recommended to send for a Certificate. All of our fair readers desire to interest themselves in the enterprise, they may be sure will profitably do so."

"GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, &c., at the establishment of ARRANDALE & CO., 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, which they offer for sale at one dollar each to close each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take any one of the articles you may draw, and no swindling, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article you receive. Certificates are worth more than that amount, and may be $30 or $100. An excellent way to make a little investing a dollar."—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

"The New York City Directory has been personally known to us, and we believe them to be a very worthy and reliable firm."—Saturday Evening Post and American Journal, June 11, 1864.

"By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement, the advantages are on the side of the customer, for he assumes no risk in the purchase, and apparently is by his everything to gain and nothing to lose. They have such confidence what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied."—New York Daily News, July 6, 1864.

"We know the firm in question to be very respectable and financially strong, and can therefore, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement."—New York Leader, July 4, 1864.

"EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have known of, has been in the sale of certificates for the Great Gift Distribution of Arrandale & Co. As all of our acquaintances but keen very successful in this way, not only in filling her own pocket, but in making others happy. To those to whom we sold the Certificates, as will be seen by our advertisement, we have given a chance to win a Gold Watch, &c."—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1865.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 02, 1865: "One of the most extensive houses in the trade for Arrandale & Co., and by request bought some 30 articles each as prizes. Called at the office of Arrandale & Co. for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth double the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times."

AGENTS—We want agents in every regiment and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate order sold by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar, also other inducements which will be found on application. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps.

HIGGINS'S
SIXTH AVENUE MAMMOTH
Millinery Establishment.

1,000 TRIMMED BONNETS at $10, $12 and $15

We invite strangers, citizens, and the public generally to examine our extensive stock before ingress in this city, and note prices, as comparing which they must necessarily beyond question, the following difference:

BONNETS for $10; Sold on Broadway at $15.
BONNETS for $12; Sold on Broadway at $16.
BONNETS for $15; Sold on Broadway at $20.
BONNETS for $20; Sold on Broadway at $30.
BONNETS for $25; Sold on Broadway at $35.

Country merchants, milliners or dealers purchasing BONNETS or JOCKEYS for their family, friends, or to sell over the country, will find it to their special advantage to visit our establishment before making their selections. We guarantee a saving of at least 20 per cent., besides the important advantage of having the LARGEST STOCK IN THE CITY to select from. Southern orders, by mail or otherwise, solicited, and dispatched with great care and promptitude.

Trimmed Derbys and Turbans, of French and domestic manufacture, including all the new shapes, designs and materials. Ladies' fashionable misses and infants, in all sizes, at all prices, of every color, from $6 TO $20.

We invite parents and guardians to examine these. You will positively save 25 per cent., besides the labour and fatigue of shopping. Ladies living at a distance can send their orders by mail for any article in the line. A cheque inclosed for the price, with the size of frame one inch around the head, and whether dark or light as to color, style, &c., as may enable us to understand your exact taste and requirements, will insure you, within a reasonable space of time, a Trimmed Bonnet or Jockey.

As much care and judgment will be used in the selection of the goods as though the parties were calling. And we guarantee complete satisfaction, and feel certain that once trade with you once, we may rely upon receiving your future patronage. When a number of Bonnets or Jockeys are ordered by one party, a reduction in the price of each will be made.

Goods expressed to all parts of the United States, collection on delivery.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the various forms of patent medicine. NEWSPAPER

Photography and Wood Engraving.

The applications of photography, already varied, are every day increasing. It is applied to sculpture, to the ornamentation of porcelain, in enlarging and reducing architectural plans, and elevations, and plans of machinery, in reproducing rare old books, deeds and manuscripts, and in multiplying accurate copies of paintings, to which engraving could not do justice. It comes to the aid of the astronomer, who studies the sun and the moon, and all their various phases and appearances through means of pictures taken by it, and it relieves the labors of the meteorologist by registering during the weary night the variations of the barometer and thermometer. A photographic department has become a necessary part of every complete observatory.

Such a department must also soon become an indispensable part of every publishing establishment. We have organized one in our own, and many of the pictures and nearly all the portraits, which our readers admire weekly, are photographed directly on the wood. The smallest carte de visite is enlarged to precisely the size we require, and the largest portraits reduced as desired. The rough sketch or the most delicate drawing are put on the block with equal facility, and comparatively little work or skill is then requisite to fit it for the hand of the engraver.

To the reader, ignorant of the processes of photography, it may appear quite as easy to put the picture on the wood as on paper, or any other substance. So it is, were that all that is desired. But we require the picture to be engraved, and if the collodion film which is exposed to the sensitive nitrate bath, and is the canvas, so to speak, on which the sun paints his picture, were to remain on the block, it would lead to two radical embarrassments. In the first place the smooth film would not receive the marks of the pencil, with which the photograph is "touched up" previous to going into the engraver's hands. In other words the pencil would not "bite." Secondly, the film would peel up before the graver, or be cut in such a ragged way that the outlines or the design, of the picture, would be destroyed. We must, therefore, get rid of the collodion, or so alter it as to obviate these difficulties.

The reader may, perhaps, inquire why not dispense with the collodion entirely, and take the picture direct on the block. But, it must be remembered wood is porous, and if exposed to the action of nitrate of silver would absorb more or less of it, so that, even if it were possible to so neutralize the nitrate on the absolute surface of the block, as to prevent it from turning wholly black after a little exposure to the light, still, whenever the block was cut into, the lines, exposing the wood below the surface would themselves turn black, and prevent the engraver from seeing the effect of his work. He would literally be working in the dark. Then, again, all photographic processes require a liberal use of water in "washing," "fixing," etc., and the dry blocks, often composed of several pieces, unless absolutely protected from the action of water would be sure to absorb it and warp—becoming thus useless for the engraver and printer.

It will now be seen that photographing on wood, with a view to engraving the pictures, requires, to make it of practical value, three things; 1st, to get rid of altogether or modify the collodion film; 2d, to prevent the nitrate of silver from sinking into the wood; and 3d, to prevent warping of the blocks from absorption of water or other liquids. We took a long time in meeting these conditions, at a considerable cost in labor and materials, but finally succeeded, overcoming all difficulties, and wedding photography to engraving and printing—a new and valued helpmate in the great task of entertaining and instructing mankind. If, as we have said before, no observatory can now be complete without a photographic department, it is equally certain no printing or publishing establishment can be complete without a similar department.

And here we may allude to the new field that has been opened to photography by the magnesium light. This metal in ribbon or fine wire, it is known will burn in the open air, as freely as iron wire in oxygen gas, and with a light sufficiently intense for photographic purposes. We will now be able to obtain interior views impossible to obtain before. Even the inner vault of the great pyramid of Egypt has been photographed through the aid of this light. Family groups, the evening party, the domestic fire-side, may now be taken by night or by day. The accessories of the individual, his surroundings showing his tastes and habits, go as far to individualize or distinguish him as his form or his features. Who would not value ten-fold more the picture of his friend taken in his easy chair, in his familiar corner, and with his pets, his books, or his instruments around him, than the stiff, formal, constrained figure taken, with his eyes "fixed on that little spot on the wall," in the torturing light of the ordinary photographic gallery?

We are led to these remarks quite incidentally, by having just received an interior view of a parlor with its family group, taken with the aid of the magnesium light, by the accomplished editor of that valuable and tasteful publication, The Philadelphia Photographer. The picture is beautiful as such, and might be taken for a careful reduction of some fine painting. The charming graduation of light and shade, the transparent shadows, and general happy effect, really make it a triumph of art, in its highest sense. Let this capacity of the photograph become understood, and it will be appreciated, superseding in great part, if not not entirely, our present mode of photographic portraiture. The greatest fortune yet made through photography will be gained by the man who first brings the magnesium light into our parlors, and makes domestic groups, at a cost that shall enable families of moderate means to avail themselves of his services.

In revising the proofs of what is printed above, we notice an example of the very work w have been describing on our first page. "The Sisters of Charity," is the reduction of a large picture made by photography on the block, with an accuracy defying criticism.

"A Look of Defiance!"

IT is stated, on good authority, that a record has been kept in Washington, of the number of persons, Mexican citizens and patriots, who have been executed in Mexico, by sentence of courts-martial, since the French apostles of civilization entered the country, and that the aggregate is upwards of 7,000. What proportion of these were murdered under the infamous decree of Maximilian, to which we last week alluded, we are not told. Contrast the conduct of these Gallic christians and civilizers with that observed by our Government during the late war. Probably, not over a dozen persons were executed during all the whole course, and these, like Wirz, Ferguson, and others, only after fair trial, and because they had outraged the rules of war.

The bloody and savage manner in which the French conduct war, is only paralleled by the manner practiced by the English. We all remember the shuddering, but partly justified atrocities, connected with the suppression of the Sepoy mutiny, when living men were blown away from the muzzles of cannon. The same savagery has characterized the suppression of the recent local outbreaks in Jamaica, where over 2,000 men and women have been summarily hung, under court-martial sentences, besides many others flogged and imprisoned. We read in the Jamaica Standard, that of about fifty of the alleged insurrectionists who were caught in one day, only twenty were shown to have been in any way implicated, and were committed for trial by court-martial. As records the remainder, nothing could be alleged against them, except that they were "straggglers." But nevertheless—we now quote from the Standard :—"They were one by one hahed in a gun and catted, receiving fifty lashes on the bare back, laid on after man-of-war fashion." Among those, thus cruelly, and apparently wantonly outraged, was a man named George Marshall, "a brown man, about twenty-five years old, who, on receiving forty-seven lashes," (we still quote literally), "ground his teeth, and gave a ferocious look of defiance at the Provost Marshal."

And what does the American reader think was the punishment which an English officer —a high minded, Christian officer, of a people who lecture us all through our war on Slavery —thought was the merited punishment of George Marshall, for his natural and least demonstrative of all protests against personal degradation and cruel outrage? Let the Standard tell us: "He was immediately ordered to be taken from the gun and hanged. No time was lost, and he was accordingly strung up."

Such being the just penalty, under the British code, for a "look of defiance," we are at a loss to know what refinement of punishment an English officer would deem proper for a word of protest, or an attempt at resistance? Possibly being blown from a gun, or drawn and quartered!

These acts prove "that the ferocity, the thirst of blood, which we denounce in savages, can take possession, too, of English hearts; and that mercy and justice can be forgotten by English officers as thoroughly as by the Indian or the Cossack."

Only, we never heard of Indian or Cossack who hung men for regarding them with "a look of defiance!"

What Marks an Era.

IN May, of the year 1622, during the reign of the gude King James I, there was printed in the city of London, a sheet about one-sixteenth the size of this paper, and issued under the name of The Weekly News, which is now constituted the first authentic newspaper ever sent forth.

Since that, the progress of the press has been onward or downward, as the intelligence or prosperity of nations have increased or waned, until, in this day, newspapers have reached a point that seems almost impossible to surpass. The London Times, with its fifteen pages of solid matter, is a wondrous type of what the daily newspaper can come to. FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, with its sixteen pages of pictures, news, and literature, is an example of a historical record of the passing time; and THE CHIMNEY CORNER, with its sixteen pages of engravings, tales, information, gossip, and humor, is what may be considered the very acme of a family paper.

Could the good citizen, who departed this life a score of years ago, with his then knowledge of what constituted a family paper, be brought back to this sphere, and have an instant's glance at THE CHIMNEY CORNER, we venture a small stake that he would sincerely regret his departure, and would at once put in a plea to be spared, for at least a year longer, that he might enjoy the mental feast that fifty-two numbers of that elegant sheet would afford him.

To the man or woman of taste and discernment, it will immediately come home, that such a paper can only be produced in a great establishment, with the most ample means of labor and expenditure. They will see that in its pages are displayed original matter that could only have been gathered from a strong corps of writers for a long series of years, that show the highest art; talent only to be secured by permanent and liberal outlay. Its publication cannot be trusted to chance effort. If we only use the services of a editor, artist, or engraver, a portion of the time, we must engage him permanently, and that at a rate of remuneration that would have staggered the publisher of twenty years ago. As journalists, to insure success, all things must be progressive, and the projectors and publishers must be ever awake to secure every novelty and every usefulness that may arise in time, regardless of price. This rule being carried out, the expense of issuing a great paper increases continually, while the price of the paper remains the same. Thus, the increased subscription list that the publisher finds his reward, an increase that surely follows newspaper enterprise, and in no case has it been more forcibly exemplified than in the success of the CHIMNEY CORNER, a success that has even astonished its publisher.

It is wonderful, when the idea is fairly grasped, that for the sum of four dollars, any one can become possessed of the contents of a paper which, at the end of a year, will be a volume of 832 pages, 1,400 engravings, and reading matter of every conceivable kind.

There is no other class of literature or art that can, for one moment, compete with it.

The President's Policy.

THE reluctance of the rebellious States to accept the definitive results of the war, and their endeavors neither to meet nor decide on the issues which have been entailed, forced the President to indicate to them a line of conduct which, he vainly trusted, their good sense and appreciation of events would have induced them to follow of their own accord. He has been compelled to tell them, in brief language, but full of grave significance, that they cannot reinstate themselves in the Union unless—

1st. They accept the Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln ("the Pope's bull against the comet") as definitive, and warranted by his Constitutional powers, as Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navies of the United States.

2d. That the Constitutional Amendment, prohibiting slavery in the United States and its territories, must be accepted.

3d. That slavery must be prohibited in the State Constitutions.

4th. That all debts or obligations incurred at home or abroad, in the attempt to subvert the Union, must be at once and for ever repudiated.

5th. That the ordinance of secession must not alone be declared repealed, but null and void. Assumption of ability to repeal implies equal ability to enact.

6th. That the emancipated slaves shall have civil rights, "equality before the law," the ability to hold property, to sue and be sued, to testify in a court of justice, in short, to be human beings, owing obligations to an organized community, and having their natural rights respected.

The evidence that the President is decided on this 6th and last proposition, is contained in a dispatch of the 17th of November, directed to the Provisional ex-Governor of Mississippi, B. G. Humphreys, as follows:

"There is no concession required on the part of the people of Mississippi or the Legislature, other than a loyal compliance with the laws and constitution of the United States, and the adoption of such measures growing out of slavery as will practically secure to the freedmen property, without regard to color, as will entitle them to remain at their constitutional relations in the Federal Union."

If the Governor and people of Mississippi cannot understand this, or, as the phrase is, "see it," they are fit subjects for the occiput.

CHARLESTON has recently witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of a convention of colored men, sitting in that city, and deliberating calmly and with judgment on their condition and wants. The Daily South Carolinian, published in that city, tells us that the assembly was respectable, and its deliberations entitled to high consideration. The published proceedings certainly would compare most favorably with those of many conventions of white men lately held in that State. Among these are short, calm and argumentative appeals to Congress, the Legislature of the State, and to the people at large. We quote three of the general resolutions adopted by the convention:

Resolved, That we appreciate with hearts overflowing with gratitude to God, the noble philanthropic spirit manifested by the various philanthropic and Christian associations of the North in providing teachers and establishing schools among us; and that we can only best testify such gratitude by heartily cooperating with them in their great work of love and humanity.

Resolved, That, as American citizens, every law now passed forever away, we would cherish in our hearts no feeling of bitterness toward those who were implicated in the crime of slaveholding; but would extend the right hand of fellowship to all, and would make our appeals alone to establish unity, peace, and brotherhood among us here.

Resolved, That we have full faith in the stability of the National Government, and that we cheerfully accept our share of the burden of taxation, trusting that the day is not distant when we shall receive its natural equivalent, the right of representation.

THE controversy with Great Britain about the damages caused to our commerce by the Alabama and other British piratical craft during the late war, ought to be pushed no further. If Great Britain, to save the payment of a few hundred thousand pounds, prefers to leave her name in the annals to become the rule and precedent for other nations, let her do so. We presume the United States will not go to war with her on the question. It would cost more than would come to us, and we are not called on to compel the world to accept a higher standard of international comity than now exists. Moreover, the material gain now than any other nation by leaving the whole issue between us and great Britain precisely where it stands. We have no occasion to change the relative positions of the privilege of turning pirates, or thy aiders or abettors of pirates, whenever it may suit their convenience. The opportunity offers of destroying the commerce of a rival nation. England knows that we mean, by asking Independence Day, that we will take to have the United States pursue towards them, if ever unhappily engaged in a great war, precisely the same conduct that they pursued in the late war, during our late great struggle? And why should we not? The Spectator truly says:

"In defending our right of negligence in the Alabama case, we should be defending a mere liberty to injure our own naval and maritime greatness in the future. We have no intention to apply the rule to ourselves."

THE following advertisement appeared in the London Times of September 29:

"PARTNER WANTED.—A practical distiller, having been experimenting for the last 17 years, can now produce for 4*d*. per gallon, by fermentation without a drop of the grape juice, and wishes a party with from £2,000 to £3,000 to form a company. Address Distiller, Box for the manufacture of his wines. His already a good connexion is known. Apply 20, &c."

It is notorious that manufactures of this kind are carried on in this city, and it is undoubted that a very large part of second port and sherry used in this country, is made in the way here indicated. It is rare, however, that counterfeiters publish their occupation.

SOME notion of the extent of the correspondence carried on with New York, may be formed from the fact, that the number of letters delivered by carriers in the city for the month of October, 1865, was 1,500,000, exclusive of deliveries at the Post Office and box deliveries, which amount to several hundred thousand more.

A SPOTTY child is an abomination, and when he grows up he becomes more insupportable still—a curse, instead of a blessing, to all around. Cleanliness is the first law to be inculcated. No man is entirely free—we have all to obey some one or something, and the sooner the lesson is learnt the sooner it is better. No one may be served in two ways, either by physical fear or by moral force. It needs no argument to show which of these two is the best, and not without a few words discuss the first, but confine ourselves to the latter. To secure their obedience by moral force, the parent, guardian, or teacher, necessary to a teacher—viz., justice and love. Without these qualities the confidence of the child will be rapidly lost, and without confidence, the attempt is hopeless. Once let a child distrust your wisdom, and you lose all parental power over him—he becomes his own master, or becomes superior to his teacher, and soon comes to either respect or love him. Justice must, however, be tempered with love, or the former would be unbearable when given. The child must not be taught to think that every trifling fault is punished as severely as the greater one. On the contrary, maintain that it is labor lost to give advice to children; we think not. The seed cannot be sown too often, and depend upon it, it will not be without fruit in after years, the same train. Perhaps the worst vice that children are addicted to, and the most difficult to deal with, is that of lying. Among many—nay among most children—a lie is thought very little of. The reason of this may be that natural timidity inherent in childhood. This should be carefully guarded against, and the necessity of truth kindly, but firmly impressed on them. These are the first lessons which lessons that childhood can learn. Let them be but once mastered, and the future course is easy.

TOWN COSSIP.

THE election is beginning to exercise its usual effect upon New York city. The usual squabbling, bibeling, pot-house shoulder-hitting, are being done, and from this date until the state election in October, all immediate citizens as have the ambition to become our rulers.

Each new return of the fall elections, brings with it some new phase of political rascality or thrift; but while all sorts of dodges are practiced to secure votes care is taken to keep them from the public eye. Sometimes these results leak out in spite of all precaution, but as a rarity for the public to get a glimpse of the primary meeting and balloting business, openly bring their shockingly bad features to the front. The last week brings through this year, in one case certainly, and that among the gamblers who operate in a financial way. A small hand-bill was hastily circulated about the city calling upon gentlemen desiring to invest, to call at a certain unknown building place on Broadway, and ask for making up "pools" on the election. On arriving at the spot, we found these pools being sold at auction. The plan is this: Each party first holds up the name of how much money he will put up on a certain candidate. The next offers as much for the counterbalance in his favorite; the third so much on his, and so on. The result of the first pool was this way:

Hoffman	-	$385 00
Gunther	-	222 50
Hall	-	200 00
Hecker	-	162 00
Farmer	-	10 00
Making in all -		$1,179 50

When the election is over, the amount is paid to the broker whose candidate is elected, and he pays five per cent. for the benefit of the holders of the pool.

And this is the way the "sporting men" work on the chances of the election. Of course, in addition, they are not violating the law which says, a man shall lose his vote who bets on the election. Surely, there are more ways of killing a dog than hanging him.

Talking of gambling, naturally takes us to Wall street, a spot that has been somewhat agitated during the past week in the gold line. Sanxian affairs, the gold operators say, is the cause, and on the strength of Sanxian affairs, they made a spasmodic effort to run gold up, an effort that did not answer well, for in a few hours down it came again, and at the present writing, is about at the old rate—149.

As connected with money, it will not be a bad idea, for one in a while, to let our country readers see what city people are obliged to pay for the food they eat, for no matter how poor they may be, that duty has to be performed:

Butter, best	-	$60 58 per lb
Cheese -	-	60 30 "
Eggs -	-	60 50 " doz.
Turkeys	-	60 25 " lb.
Chickens	-	60 22 " "
Geese -	-	60 20 " "
Venison	-	60 25 " "
Apples	-	4 00 " bbl.
Cranberries	-	10 00 " "
Beef, choice	-	60 30 " lb.
Mutton	-	60 29 " "
Pork	-	60 16 " "
Veal	-	60 25 " "
Potatoes, best	-	4 75 " bbl.
Onions, white	-	3 50 " "
Cabbage -	-	60 5 " head

And all other things in proportion. All this, in our present state of prosperity, affects none but the workingman, who, although he may be constantly employed, is constantly encumbered with rent, and does not seem to be getting, as small, for a higher rate of wages, but as though he must keep a certain amount of money locked up in favor of a shorter day's work.

The workingman has but eight hours labor out of the twenty-four to enough, and we think so too, and yet we have their cry out against it, and they will not get it. They may hold mass meetings at the Cooper Institute, and make as much squalor as possible, may be brought to bear, and yet they will have to come back to first principles. Labor is a commodity for exchange, and is to be sold into the market for sale, it will bring what it is worth, and no more. As the man will work for more or less hours, the employer will employ another the same price for eight hours work. Combinations may have their advantages, but employer and men will as a consequence offer either their brains or their muscle at a low price, and the result in the end, this is the case now in the cities.

What we want is agricultural labor. We want some of our surplus muscular force thrown upon the farms, and food will be produced cheaper, and the laborer arrives at the last content and will put it in practical use with short hours and the natural consequence, money will put money in his purse.

We see that an importation division has just been rendered in the Court of Appeals, in favor of the City Railroads, exempting them from paying the $50 per car license imposed upon them by the city ordinance of 1864. The amount involved is over $100,000, and as the law since it was passed, and a test case was made by the city against the Third Avenue Railroad, is the one just decided. This company alone employs nearly 100 cars, and in this decision extort from the city about $5,000. Besides the case just decided, there are now in the courts 20 cases against different companies, and 1100 complaints for prosecution.

As connected with railroads, we see a decision has just been rendered in Cincinnati, which, without doubt, will soon be transferred to this city. There a colored person, of the male persuasion, has just recovered a verdict of $5,000 against a railroad company from the car. The company had printed notices posted in all the cars, that men paying full fare and children could ride inside, but that the gentlemen of color must occupy the front platform. The gentleman in question insisted upon going in where his wife and

If he is grateful to be restricted that the action of most of the lately rebellious States has been, and is such, as to call from the President such reminders of their condition and prospects as are contained in the following dispatch from him to Gov. Holden, of North Carolina, dated November 27:

"The results of the recent elections in North Carolina have greatly damaged the prospects of the State in the restoration of its Governmental relations.

"Should the action and the spirit of the Legislature and the State convention in all future proceedings manifest already done, and might be fatal.

"It is hoped the action and spirit manifested by the Legislature will be so directed as rather to repair than increase the difficulties under which the state has already placed itself."

An extraordinary error, in addition, occurred in the excellent periodical from which we extracted our summary of the amount of tonnage captured by the Anglo-Confederate pirates during the war. It was stated at nearly "1,000,000 of tons," which would be nearly one-fifth of our commercial marine. The true statistics gives 110,000 tons, as the amount of tonnage captured. Of this amount a considerable part was "bonded," so that the probable amount destroyed would not much exceed 100,000 tons—which is one hundred thousand tons too much.

child was, and ejectment was the consequence, a lawsuit, and $800 to pay. For ourselves we think the question should be one of cleanliness alone, and that a well kept darkey is 100 per cent. better than a dirty white man.

Among the items of the week, is an unblushing record of the intention of two ocean-going steamers to run a race. The Baltic, of the Pacific U. S. S. Co.'s line, and the Santiago de Cuba, of the Nicaragua line, will leave for San Francisco, and openly declare that it is to be a race all the way. Some will say that this is the business of the passengers alone, who trust their lives and property with them; but, we opine, that the passengers are asked little about it, and that it is a question for the entire public. The outrages that have been performed by these California lines, and lives that have been sacrificed by them, is an unwritten history. But a day of reckoning has got to come, and when it does, let all reckless travel-mongers stand from under.

One of the daily papers gives this as a spicy paragraph:

"Church Jigs.—After a sermon on Congregational Music, Dr. Armitage, of the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, lately, set his congregation to laughing, by relating his experience in Tremont Temple, Boston. He had heard of its choir of 100 singers, and the organ, which required a steam-engine to fill the bellows—expected to hear something grand. Heard a jig! Gave out another hymn. Another jig! 'I'll fix you,' he said; 'I'll give you one that can't be sung to a dancing tune.' So he selected the hymn—

'From all that dwell below the skies
Let the Creator's praise arise.'

'Sing it to devil music if you can,' he said to himself. Sure enough, another jig! 'I went from Tremont Temple as soon as possible,' he said, 'and have not been seen there since, and to get me there again, to have my experience repeated, would need a bigger steam-engine than the one that works their organ.'"

How dignified and chaste!

We see that a new word has been coined, to take the place of that of "matinée." It is "vesperines," and is applied to an afternoon performance. The word is a good one; and whoever "invented" it, has shown that he is posted in the fact that the word "matinée" will not apply to afternoon performances.

Among the matters of art that should attract the attention of every one, is that of the exhibition of Ward's "Indian Hunter." This elegant piece of sculpture is at Snedecor's Gallery, in Broadway, just below 9th street, and open free to the public. It represents a stalwart savage bending forward, in the act of listening, with his left hand extended, while his right rests upon the neck of a wolf-hound. It is rather larger than life, and the modeling and posé of the figure are superb. There is life and force in every muscle and swelling vein, and the attitude of the dog is as good as that of the man. What is the ultimate destination of this real work of art we have not heard; but it should grace some gallery, where it will not be shut away from the public, or from those who would study art in its highest sense.

In the same gallery are some exquisite gems, among which we call attention to a Marine, the first on the left of the room, as we enter. The water is water itself.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Some time since a young lady named Agnes Young was missed from her home in the village of Moran, Warren county, and no trace could be found of her. She has recently returned home, and tells a strange, but doubtless true story of having been seized near her father's house, gagged and drugged, and made insensible, in a piece of woods near by; that she was then rowed across the Hudson in a boat, and taken some distance in a wagon to a deserted house, being threatened with death if she attempted to escape. She did, however, get away, and after an absence of nine weeks, has returned to her grief-stricken parents.

—— A venerable gentleman in his 80th year, residing in Fall River, who has recently been on a visit to some relatives in Worcester, Mass., (says the Spy), wears a pair of boots which he purchased in April, 1843, for which he paid the sum of $2 50. The boots are now in good condition, and have been worn every year since their purchase. When at home he pulls off his boots with a "jack" which was made in 1696. The same old gentleman has his wedding vest, which is about 60 years old.

—— A good deal of excitement has been caused in Nashville, Tenn., through the discovery by the Committee of the Legislature appointed to investigate the affairs of the State Bank, that between five and six millions in spurious notes had been issued by the rebel Gov. Harris and his accomplices. Their plan was to issue the notes and date them back before the rebellion commenced, in order to give them a greater apparent value, especially in case of a collapse of the rebellion.

—— A Washington correspondent says that the Treasury Department is greatly plagued with the cotton question. Every agent sent down is straightway washed out of sight at the Department under the flood of charges against his honesty. "I know I sent some honest men down there," said the Secretary in despair, the other day, "but it looks very much as if none of them could stay so long."

——The New Albany, Indiana, Ledger says an ex-army sutler, who resides in Indianapolis, made $2,000,000 in 14 months, which he invested in United States bonds, thus escaping taxation.

—— A woman was arrested in Parkersburg, Va., last week on a charge of swindling Federal officers of large sums of money. It is stated that she has been married to four different military officers within the last three months, with all of whom she lived a few days, when she secured their money and decamped. She is not more than 22 years of age, and it is said she succeeded in stealing upwards of $3,000 in this manner.

—— Two children, named Antonie Morle, aged five years, and Hervaise Morle, three years of age, residing with their father at Wellington Bridge, near Montreal, were recently scalded to death by the upsetting of a pot of boiling water. The children were sleeping beside the stove, when a man came into the house drunk, and, while attempting to light his pipe, upset the stove and a large pot of boiling water upon the children.

—— A Cincinnati young lady who enthusiastically admired Gen. Grant, stole the cigar from under his nose at a reception at the Burnet House. The hero was too much astounded by the audacity to prevent or punish the theft.

—— At "late investigations," held by juries, as a cause of railroad disasters, etc., sundry conductors alleged they could not reasonably be blamed; that it was the business of each train to look out for its own safety!

—— Mrs. Elizabeth Daniels recently died at Portsmouth, Vermont, aged 82 years. Her husband, adopted son, his wife, and their daughter, and all her other relatives, have been lost at sea.

—— An enterprising manufacturer of fertilizers has offered $1,200 for permission to dig up the bones of the horses around Washington.

—— The great cabbage growers about New York City generally calculate upon 10,000 heads per acre, allowing four superficial feet to each plant, which gives a surplus of 3,560 feet for missing plants. We suppose the crop may average five cents a head, giving $500 an acre, which, considering it is a second or third crop of the season, affords a pretty good return.

—— The supply of wool in 1864 is estimated to have been as follows:

	Pounds.
Atlantic States	91,298,965
California	8,000,000
Imported at New York	56,874,128
Total	156,173,093

In the year 1860, the production of domestic wool was 55,020,639 pounds, of foreign about 35,000,000 pounds, making a total supply of 90,000,000 pounds; thus the consumption of 1864 shows an excess of 66,000,000 pounds over the supply of 1860.

—— The Jews have, as a body, shown their full share of patriotism. The number of Jews in the U. S. army during the late war was 40,000. They have established five asylums for disabled solders, their widows and orphans, the benefits of which are limited to no faith or creed—one at New York, one at Philadelphia, one at Cincinnati, one at Chicago, and one at St. Louis.

—— The correspondent of a Lewiston, Maine, journal says that among the large families in the town of Waldoboro are the following names: Head, Foote, Hyde, Horn, Sides, Hough, Heart, Bowles (for bowels), Haslet. Thus the town was everything except Tail, when at last a Prussian came in, named Onbehind.

—— A correspondent writing from Tennessee says that while an officer of the Nashville military prison was crossing the railroad track near that city a few days since, in a wagon driven by a negro, and having two notorious convicts in charge, the team was struck by a passing train, by which the officer, together with the horses were instantly killed, and the driver shockingly mutilated. The most singular part of the affair is that instead of seizing the opportunity to escape, one of the convicts started with all speed in search of a surgeon, while the other remained to watch over the dead body of his keeper.

—— The colored people of Selma held a meeting on the 19th ult., and passed a series of resolutions, in which they complain that they are every day robbed and beaten by men wearing the Federal uniform, and that they had applied in vain to the police and military guard for protection. A committee of three was appointed to wait upon the mayor and commanding officer of the district, to invoke their authority to suppress the outrages complained of. The resolutions conclude with the expression of a desire to live on terms of peace and quietness with the Southern people, and earn an honest living.

—— The Wilmington (N. C.) Dispatch publishes the following. It explains itself: In consequence of the repudiation by the representatives of the people of North Carolina, of their fairly and honestly contracted debt, I and my children have been made losers to the extent of $94 000 in the bonds authorized by the Legislature of 1860, in favor of the Wilmington, Charlotte and Rutherford railroad. This compels me to offer myself as an instructress in French, music on the piano and singing, at the residence of my father, Dr. A. J. De Rossey, corner of Second and Dock. Mrs. Col. Gaston Meares.

—— An engineer at Nashville, Tenn., sent a workman under his locomotive to oil the running gear, and then forgetting his presence, ran his engine ahead just far enough to cut off one of the man's legs. A bystander shouted to warn the engineer, who thereupon backed his machine in dismay, and cut off the other leg of the unfortunate workman. He survived, however, and suing the company for $50,000 damages, has obtained $5,500.

—— The Southern newspapers are refusing to insert the advertisements of negroes, without the word "colored" or "Freedman" is attached to them. The Augusta (Ga.) Constitutionalist says, in reply to an indignant darkey: "Now we desire to say, for the benefit of all such gemmen of color, that if they are ashamed of their color we can't help it, and that no advertisement of theirs will be published in this paper, unless it distinctly makes known their status."

—— James McCormick, the oldest man in the United States, died in Newburgh, N. Y., on the 11th instant, at the age of 114 years. He was born August 6, 1751, in the county of Cavan, Ireland, and was the father of 14 children. His life was very temperate, and his health excellent up to the time of his fatal illness.

—— The number of patents issued at Washington since January 1, 1865, is 6,220. The estimated number to be issued during the coming month is 450, making a total of 6,670 for the year 1865. The number issued in 1864 was 5,250.

—— The census returns show that the total number of Indians in the United States is 307,000. About 5,000 were in the service of the government during the war, and some thousands more were on the side of the rebels.

—— The United States Naval Burial Bureau, under the charge of Brevet-Major J. M. Moore, makes the following report of deaths and burials: "The number of white soldiers that have died in Washington, D. C., from August 1, 1861, to November 29, 1865, is 15,412, and the number of colored soldiers is 6,328. The whole number that have died at Andersonville, Georgia, including soldiers, sailors, employees and citizens, is 12,918. The number of soldiers buried at Spottsylvania Court House and the Wilderness is 1,500; at Nashville, Tenn., 32,000; and at Richmond, Va., 60,000. Of the soldiers buried in and around Washington, 4,220 are from New York, 86 from Illinois, 219 from Indiana, 782 from Michigan, 510 from Ohio, and 200 from Connecticut. The number of those that died from the effect of wounds is 3,806, and 2,464 are reported to have died of typhoid fever. There are 11,285 men buried near Washington whose names and regiments are unknown. The employees of Major Moore's bureau are now engaged in exhuming the bodies of our dead defenders at the average rate of twenty per day."

Foreign.—An illustration of Russian rule in Poland is shown by a fact just come to light. The lunatic asylum at Warsaw—a Government institution, of course —has been visited by the police. On this occasion some 50 out of the 144 patients were discovered to be political offenders, who had fled for refuge to the abode of madness, and spent already a couple of years within its terrible walls. The physicians have been arrested, together with the delinquents.

—— In the garden of a restaurateur, at Vienna, there had existed since 1853 an enormous beer-barrel, the capacity being such that the interior had been converted into a room for dancing. Recently a ball took place there, which visitors did not leave till three in the morning. At half-past four, when all was quiet, an alarm of fire was given, and the barrel was found to be in flames. In the course of two hours, in spite of all the efforts of the proprietors, it was reduced to ashes. The loss is estimated at 40,000 francs.

—— A man, named Samuel Taylor, 36 years of age, hanged himself in London lately, and, at the inquest, the father, who gave evidence, attributed the act to his son's partiality for smoking, which he thought had affected his brain. The pipe, he said, was never out of his mouth. The jury, in their verdict, adopted the opinion that the deceased was insane, but declined to say whether the pipe had anything to do with his insanity.

—— The workmen of Raubiax, France, are about to establish among themselves an association for purchasing articles of food, wholesale, to be retailed among themselves at a small profit, which, after the deduction of expenses, will be divided among the members. A bakery is first to be established, then stores for meat, groceries, &c. Such associations are increasing rapidly in various parts of France.

—— Queen Isabella, of Spain, has given another instance of generosity. Some time ago she relinquished a portion of her income, in consequence of the low state of the public exchequer. She has now renounced a further portion, and has ordered that the amount of the civil list so saved shall be devoted to the sufferers by the cholera, and by the floods which took place some months ago.

—— A Paris paper mentions, among the important affairs of the day, the fact that the Prince Imperial, who has heretofore taken his meals with his teacher, is now "admitted to the table of his august parents."

—— A retired officer, aged 70, at Quevrain, in Belgium, wrote a letter, stating that the brilliancy of the sun rendered life unsupportable, and then committed suicide.

—— Those going to Panama, will be pleased to learn that "the cemetery for foreigners is progressing favorably."

—— In England, a half a holiday on Saturday afternoon is almost universal among the business men and manufacturers. Few factories or stores are open, and the principle is even extending into the public offices.

—— An American, writing from Mexico, says that, without three millions of foreign emigration, a vast acquisition of capital, and thoroughly liberal laws, neither empire nor republic can ever stand in Mexico.

—— A commercial traveler, named Alexander Macintosh, was recently fined $15 and costs by the Croydon (England) magistrates, for attempting to kiss a young lady, named Sutton, while traveling in a railway train through a tunnel.

—— Madame Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is obliged to pass her winter in the south of Europe for the benefit of her health.

—— There are 84 religious orders in Italy, 80 of which occupy 1724 monasteries, and four are mendicant orders, occupying 658 monasteries. The total number of monks and nuns is 45,829. The revenues of these orders amount to 16,216,532 lire, more than half of which are derived from Sicily. The 229 bishops sees represent a yearly income of 7,737,214 lire, and the incomes of the beneficed clergy amount to 36,912,722 lire. In all, the revenues of the Italian Church amount to 76,267,016 lire, 46,026,124 of which are derived from landed property.

—— The tomb of the most truly national artist France ever possessed is just completed. Horace Vernet's last resting-place is marked by a single block of granite, on which rests a white marble slab, the upper part of which, although placed in an horizontal position, is in the form of a Latin cross. A pallet and brushes sculptured on the front of the monument, alone remind the passer-by that there rests the ashes of the greatest painter this century has produced in France.

—— Messrs. Trübner & Co., of London, are about to publish the first number of a new comic scientific periodical, entitled Gammon and Spinach. The projectors believe that the boundary between the sublime and the ridiculous is as often over overstripped by the savant as by the politician, lawyer, or any other person in society who figures in the pages of our favorite comic journals, and that such false steps offer a wide field for fun. Full reports of the meetings of British scientific societies and reviews are also promised.

—— The operation of casting a cubic block of steel, of the enormous weight of 100 tons, was successfully accomplished recently at the new works of Messrs. Bessemer & Sons, at East Greenwich, England.

—— A conscription of seven men per 1,000 is being rigorously carried out in Poland, the classes liable being all young men between 20 and 24 years of age. Three are drawn for every one taken, and as the lottery is one in which the stakes are lives, the horror excited throughout Poland may be imagined. Every conscript drawn is liable to fifteen years service in any part of the empire, during which he is almost unpaid, scantily fed, and wretchedly clothed, subjected to blows at the will of his officers, and regarded by his family as one dead. The conscription consequently is carried out by districts, strong bodies of Russian troops overawing resistance, and the garrisons on the frontier have been immensely increased. The Jews contrive to slip away in large numbers, and the government has therefore passed an edict, that whenever a member of a Jew family is found absent another member shall be taken, an order intended to set brother against brother and father against sons. The marvel is that regiments thus formed do not take the first opportunity of mutinying, but discipline as carried out in the Russian service seems too strong even for human nature.

—— M. Bossange, the founder of the well-known firm of publishers of Paris and London, died recently, in his hundreth year. He had hoped, on the completion of his century of years, to preside at a banquet in celebration of the event, to be given to a hundred of his friends, at the Louvre Hotel!

—— The French savans say, to obtain sufficient nourishment from oysters alone, a man must eat sixteen dozen per day.

—— In the French Journal of Natural Science, Cosmos, M. Bondin communicates a statistical survey of the number of persons who, between the years 1835 and 1863, have been killed, or injured, by lightning in France. Within the space of these eighteen years, 2,238 persons have been killed, at the annual maximum of 111, the minimum of 48; double this number were hurt. Among 880 persons killed by lightning, from 1854 to 1863, 243, or 26-7 per cent were females. When the lightning struck among groups of people, composed of both sexes, the male was always the greatest sufferer. When the lightning struck among herds of cattle, the shepherd was frequently spared. In several cases, one person was struck by lightning more than once. One quarter of the people killed by lightning had sought shelter under trees. It is a general belief that beech trees are always spared by the lightning; but cases have been shown here that beeches also have been struck by the electric fluid.

—— A serious revolt appears to have broken out in Algeria. A confederacy of tribes, called the Zegdon, who live in an oasis in the far south, have formed an alliance with a family named Hamza, and the head of the latter has appeared in the field with some 50,000 men. They will be defeated, of course, but they can retreat, and, from the nature of the country, a broad belt of desert between French territory and their home, they cannot be followed.

Besides the valuable direct trade with England, Chile maintains extensive commerce with many of the English Colonies. During this year Chile has supplied Australia and New Zealand with 95 cargoes (about 50,000 tons) of flour and wheat. Had it not been for the proximity and ability of Chile to supply the deficiency in Australia, very high prices must have ruled their, and sufferings have been entailed on the working classes from the scarcity of bread.

The House-builder Moth.—The Oriental idea that feminine delicacy is only to be maintained by concealing the face, seems to have been borrowed from the house-builder moth, which is a perfect model of female excellence, according to Oriental notions, always staying at home, always hiding her face, and always producing enormous familes. Perhaps the male may be attracted to the female by some peculiar instinct, for the eyes can have little to do with the discovery, she being so closely shut up in her house, and never leaving it till the day of her death.

THE SISTERS OF CHARITY.

The beautiful engraving on our first page requires no words to tell its story. It is part and parcel of that art which is doing so much to refine and soften human nature—the domestic—and we cannot believe that there is any way in which we can benefit society better, than by occasionally giving one of these pictures to the million through our columns, and bringing that within the reach of the people, which is well worthy of framing, and holding an exalted place by the family hearth, and which otherwise would be only enjoyed by the few.

The order of the Sisters of Charity was founded in France about the close of the 17th century, by St. Vincent de Paul and Madlle. le Gras, the object being to attend the sick poor, and educate orphans and poor children. They are not nuns, but the order is considered the first step in benevolence.

In this country it was founded by Mrs. William Seton, the widow of an eminent merchant of New York, and from its foundation has spread into every locality in the land, doing good past all recording.

In our late terrible strife the sisters were everywhere, upon the battle-field, in the hospitals, and on shipboard, soothing and succoring all, without distinction of age, sex or creed, and carrying with them blessings and praise, even from the most bigoted religionists.

In New York City the order wears a close black cap, but in all other parts of the United States, the costume is as in the picture, and as it is in Europe.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A gentleman, in Lewiston, Me., says the other day a girl called at his door, and asked if his family "wanted house help?" He replied they did.

"Do you have small children?" she asked.

"No."

"Do you have your washing done out of the house?"

"No."

"Will my room be carpeted?"

"Yes."

After going on awhile in this manner, the gentleman turned the tide, and said he would like to ask her a few questions:

"Can you play the piano?" he began.

"Oh, no."

"Can you speak French?"

"No."

"Can you sing the opera?"

"No."

"Can you dance the Lancers?"

"No."

"Well, then," he concluded, "if you can't do any of these, you won't suit."

And off went the astonished maiden, smelling mice.

An amusing colloquy came off at the supper table, on board of one of our Mississippi boats, between a Boston exquisite, reeking with hair-oil and cologne, who was cursing the waiters, assuming very consequential airs, and a raw Jonathan seated by his side, dressed in homespun. Turning to his vulgar friend, the former pointed with his jeweled finger, and said:

"Butter, sah!"

"I see it is," coolly replied Jonathan.

"Butter, sah, I say!" fiercely repeated the dandy.

"I know it; very good; a first-rate article."

"Butter, I tell you!" thundered the dandy, in still louder tones, pointing with slow, unmoving finger, and scowling upon his neighbor, as if he would annihilate him.

"Well, gosh all Jerusalem, what of it?" now yelled the downeaster, getting his dander up in turn. "You don't think I took it for lard?"

A Sabbath school teacher asked a young pupil the meaning of "the wages of sin is death." The boy did not know what wages were, and was asked "What his father got Saturday night?"

"Drunk," was the answer.

A lady who is opposed to having euchre played in her house all the time, recently sent out invitations for a social party, and lest there might be a mistake, she added:

"No cards."

A miller had his neighbor arrested under the charge of stealing wheat from his mill, but being unable to substantiate the charge by proof, the court adjudged that the miller should make an apology to the accused.

"Well," says he, "I have had you arrested for stealing my wheat—I can't prove it—and am sorry for it."

George the First, when he landed in England, said to some of the crowd assembled, "I come for your goods," (meaning for your welfare), and that one of the crowd replied (alluding to the good things the Germans would pick up), "Aye, and chattels, too, I expect."

Nota Bene.—A number of tourists, when they alight at an inn in the Highlands, are in the practice of scratching their names, etc., on the window-glass. A short time since, one of a party of four had written his own name, and the names of his three companions, with the month and year in which they made their visit. Immediately under their names, and in quite a different hand (evidently by some wag,) is inscribed: "Nota Bene.—The whole of the above were hanged for stealing sheep."

"Jeannie," said a Scotchman to his daughter, who was asking his consent to accompany her urgent and favored suitor to the altar: "Jeannie, it's a very solemn thing to get married."

"I know it, father," replied the sensible damsel, "but it's a solemner thing not to."

"What a fool!" said Patty Prim, when she heard of the capture of Jeff Davis, "of course the men would all run after him if he was dressed as a woman, and he was sure to be caught."

A Highlander, under the influence of liquor, once went, on a very hot day, to be married, by the Rev. Mr. Grant, of Abernethy. The service having commenced, the bridegroom was asked:

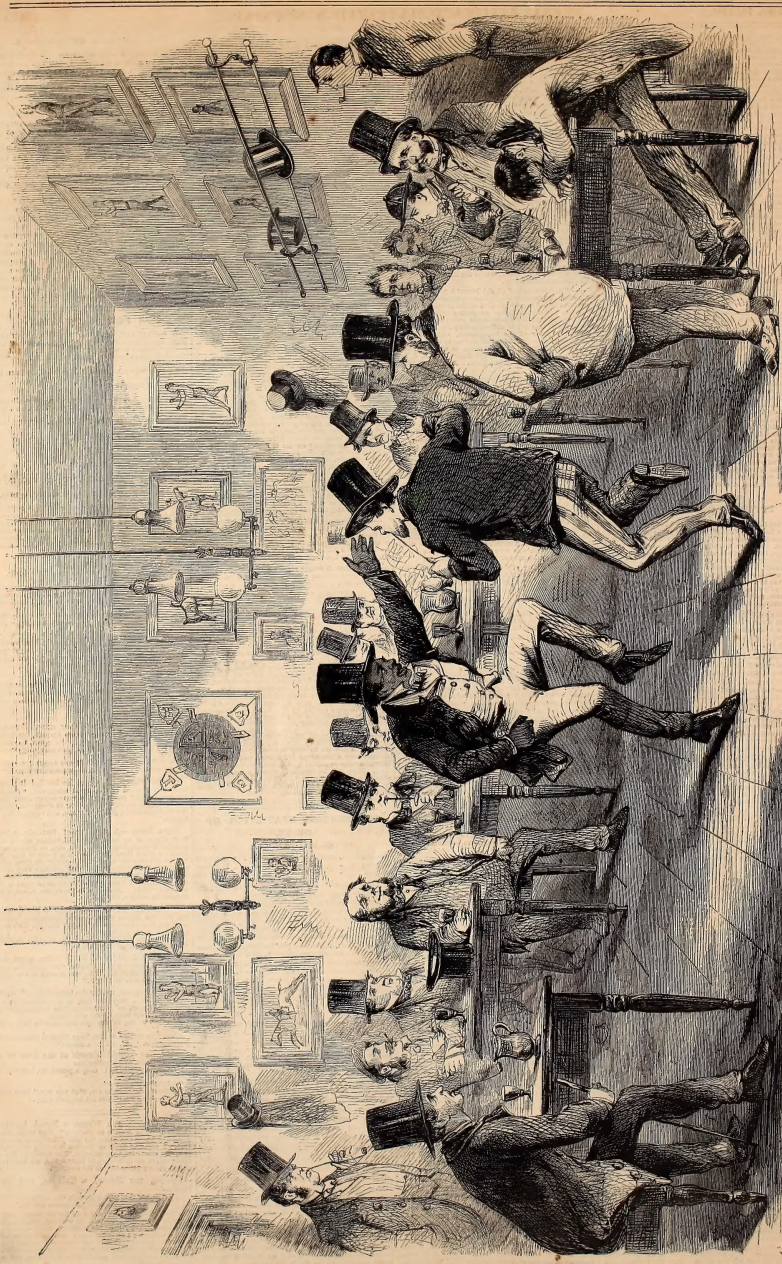
"Are you willing to take this woman to be your wedded wife?"

"Yes," he replied, wiping large drops of perspiration from his face, "yes, if I got a drink!"

A beggar posted himself at the door of a Chancery Court, and kept saying:

"A penny, please, sir! Only a penny, sir, before you go in!"

"And why, my man?"



"Because, the chances are, that you won't have one when you come out!" was the beggar's reply.

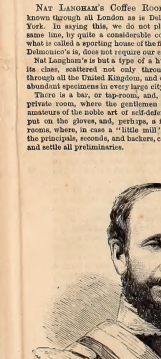
The Ordeal for Wives, a Novel, by the author of "The Morals of Mayfair." New York: The American News Company, 119 and 121 Nassau street. 1865. A pleasant story of English domestic life, well told, and calculated for popularity. The American News Company, in the getting up of their books, are not surpassed by any publishers in the country.

Erring, yet Noble, a Tale of, and for Women.

"Eighty thousand women in one smile,
Who only smile at night beneath the gas."

New York: John Bradburn, No. 49 Walker street. 1865. The title of this work will tell its contents, but though many may consider it a bold book, yet, when carefully read, it will show a meaning and a moral rarely found in a work professing to treat the errors of woman. The style, though occasionally rough, is direct and forcible. It will, no doubt, create considerable discussion, and is well worth reading.

A CELEBRATED ENGLISH SPORTING HOUSE.



KILLING CROWS IN VIRGINIA.—FROM A DRAWING BY G. PERKINS.

AN ENGLISH SPORTING HOUSE.

NAT LANGHAM'S Coffee Room is as well known through all London as is Delmonico's in New York. In saying this, we do not place them on the same line, by quite a considerable count, Nat's being what is called a sporting house of the first water. What Delmonico's is, does not require our explanation.

Nat Langham's is but a type of a hundred others of its class, scattered not only through London, but through all the United Kingdom, and of which we have abundant specimens in every large city in this country.

There is a bar, or tap-room, and, adjoining this, a private room, where the gentlemen of the F. R., or amateurs of the noble art of self-defence, can retire, to put on the gloves, and, perhaps, a few other private rooms, where, in case a "little mill" is on the tapis, the principals, seconds, and backers, can come together, and settle all preliminaries.

GEN. PEDRO DIAZ CANSECO.

The tap-room is the great point of attraction. Here, upon any ordinary night, about 10 or 12 o'clock, can be found the aristocracy of the prize ring, and, perhaps, a sprinkling of those from other rings. Perhaps, side by side with some scion of a noble family, may be found "The Fuggly Chicken," or "The Bayswater Bruiser," while "white spirits and black, blue spirits and gray," mingle indiscriminately, whiling away the time with pots of half-and-half, or stout, "goes of gin, or summut short," enlivened with an occasional song from a member of the bruising fraternity, or a break-down from more than one.

As the small hours approach, the fun grows fast and furious, the theatre-going part of the sporting world drop in, reporters for the press saunter along, and the nobs of the F. R. are in their glory as lions.

On the walls of the tap-room are hung those efforts of art dearest to the patrons, the pictorial record of the great fight between "The Bigtown Smasher"† and "The Fancy Bantam," or (the colors for "The Champion," in the shape of a silk handkerchief, handsomely framed, and holding a conspicuous place.

The highest ambition of the prize fighter is—when life's final fights are over—to settle down with his winnings and savings, in a public house of his own, an end that is often achieved by those who are careful, and obtain the confidence of the gentlemen of the F. R.

Tom Sayers, the champion of England, who fought that celebrated battle with Heenan, kept a house of this class, and, as he is just dead, it will not be a bad closing to this account, to republish, from the London News, of November 16, a short account of his funeral, that our countrymen can see what style of admirers the gentlemen of the F. R. have:

"Soon after noon on a vast crowd had assembled in High street, Camden Town, where the ex-champion lived, and the main thoroughfare, from the Mother Redcap, for several hundred yards towards Hampstead, was infested by what looked like an execution mob. The shops were nearly all closed, partly, perhaps, out of respect to the memory of Sayers, and partly, there can be no question, out of deference to the evidently predatory instincts of the crowd. Jostling, swearing and rough chaff, wishes that the music would come, jostling and horse play were the occupations most in vogue. All the way from High street to the cemetery the same class of people, on foot, in carts, and on the roof and inside of over-laden cabs, were to be seen steadily making for the hero's grave. At the cemetery itself the gates were guarded by what seemed a strong body of policemen, who only admitted people who either "gave the number of their tomb," or otherwise justified their claim to enter. At 2 P. M. the crowd was easily kept in order, but half an hour later a successful rush was made, and some hundred sturdy vagabonds carried the gates by main force, amid the yells and shouts of their companions. The police succeeded in reclosing the gates, and in again exercising their discriminating as to whom they should admit. As it was, the tombs and covered crypts were crowded with people, who turbulently jostled and laughed, trampled on the grass, and defiled the graves, with as little reverence for the place they were in, as if it had been an old prize ring. The succeeding two hours were taken up in watching the hand-to-hand combat between the police outside and the rapidly increasing crowd of roughs, in the arrival and admission of lovers of celebrities, and admission being the signal for a struggle, on the part of those who wished to force their way, and in securing vantage ground from which to see the procession.

"Soon after 4 P. M. the sound of drums and fifes was heard, and the hearse and mourning coaches struggled through the swaying, disorderly mob. Sports pony and dog cart, with his magnificent dog, the sole support of the latter, followed immediately after the hearse. The police contrived to keep back the crowd much for a few moments; but as soon as the coffin was taken in to the cemetery chapel, and before the carriages had left it, the crowd of thieves and blackguards proved too strong for those opposed to them, and the gates were again stormed. The members of the band, while in the act of playing the "Dead March," were scattered pell mell, their instruments flying overhead and themselves running for safety. Hundreds of the foulest scum of the back courts and alleys of London, the creatures who only come to light, in the aggregate, at an execution or racecourse, or an illegal betting ground, rushed in to hold sanguinaria at the grave. For a few minutes the police were completely overcome. They were a mere handful of men against the enemy, but they subsequently rallied and once more succeeded in closing the cemetery gates. Many of the roughs were trodden down in the raid, and after it was over, the gasping, speechless forms stretched at, no unfrequent intervals on the grass, or reared by their luckier comrades against the tombs, while neckcloths were torn open and animation restored, spoke of the severity of the conflict."

KILLING CROWS IN VIRGINIA.

A SCENE that must be familiar to thousands, not only of the youthful, but of the older generation, is that of crow killing in Virginia. Not that Virginia alone has a patent for that especial line of sport, but that among the American citizens, of African descent, it is an ancient and esteemed mode of enjoyment, which combines within itself the exciting and the useful.

The mode is to sally out at night, and, making a halt in such locality as the crows are known to roost, build just enough of a fire to see by. Long saplings are then cut, with a few branches on one end and a sturdy darkey upon the other, whose good muscles, using the sapling as a flail, thrashes the birds from the lower branches of the trees where they roost.

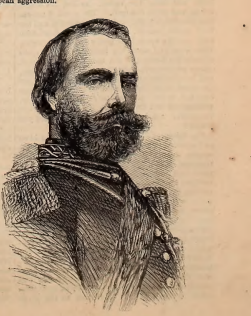
On a successful battue of this kind, it is not uncommon that a thousand crows are killed, and so much good done, not only to the agricultural interest of that vicinity, but, perhaps, to others where these corn destroyers may migrate.

LEADERS OF THE PERUVIAN REVOLUTION.

Col. Mariano Ignacio Prado, and Gen. Pedro Diaz Canseco.

WHEN Spain, taking advantage of our civil war, sought to re-establish her power over Peru, the richest of her lost possessions in South America, she met a determined hostility on the part of the people of that Republic, in whom was roused the spirit of their fathers, the conquerors of Junin and Ayacucho. This feeling was shared by the representatives of the people in Congress, and every preparation was made to resist Spanish pretensions and aggression by force of arms. But at the moment when it was supposed the sword would be unsheathed, the government of the country, at the head of which was Vice-President Pezet, previously suspected of treachery and corruption, made a most humiliating submission to Spain, promising to pay her four millions of dollars to defray the expenses of her hostile demonstration on Peru!

This capitulation was received throughout the country with mingled shame and anger, and it was only required that a leader should appear to induce the people to inaugurate a revolution against the usurping and pusillanimous central power. This leader was found in the person of Col. MARIANO IGNACIO PRADO, at that moment holding the position of Prefect of the Department of Arequipa, the second in importance in Peru.



On the 6th of February last, he issued a proclamation denouncing the cowardice and treachery of Pezet, and calling on the people to organize for expelling him from the place he had disgraced, and to deprive him of the trust he had betrayed. The garrison of Arequipa responded to the appeal, and the movement extended so rapidly, that in less than four months the power of the traitor Pezet was confined to the City of Lima and Fort Callao. The fleet, sympathizing with the people, also went over to the side of the revolution—a true and just revolution, which, as many of the partisans of Spain have sought to stigmatize as a rebellion.

Meantime, Gen. Canseco, second Vice-President of the Republic, was called to the exercise of the office of President, Pezet's place having been declar-d vacant. Col. Prado, nevertheless, still holding the place of Commander-in-Chief of the revolution-ary, or liberating army. At last accounts, at the head of 10,000 men, he was approaching Lima, the last refuge of Pezet, the tool of Spain, and was on the eve of a battle, which, if won by the revolutionists, will reinstate the sacrificed honor of the country, and destroy the last vestige of Spanish influence in Peru, which country will then make common cause with Chili, in her contest with Spain.

Col. Prado is still a young man. He was born in the city of Huanuco, on the highlands of Peru; was educated in the college of San Carlos, the oldest in America, and, for a number of years followed the profession of planter, near his native city. In the contest between Gens. Castilla and Echinique, in 1854, he espoused the cause of the former, and was exiled in consequence, by the latter. He, however, managed to return to the country, and took up arms under Gen. Castilla, and was efficient in gaining the decisive battle of La Palma in his favor. At the commencement of the troubles with Spain, he was Military Governor of Tacna, and was prominent in the patriotic outburst occasioned by that event. Possessed of great decision and energy of character, unimpeachable in conduct, and with fine ability in field and council, he unquestionably stands at the head of the young men of Peru, into whose hands the destinies of the country are now passing, and who are distinguished for a hearty, open, determined American-ism, which they regard as a practical principle, and not one of what have been aptly termed "glittering generalities."

Gen. Canseco is a native of Arequipa, which city has produced more able and distinguished men, than any other of Peru, and was elected Second Vice-President, in the same election with the reactionary First Vice-President Pezet. He was unanimously called on to act as President by the country, when the treachery of Pezet became known, and should he succeed in entering Lima, will be the undisputed Executive of the nation. He is a man of great personal worth, and extended influence, and in principle a through-paced republican.

Since the above was put in type, the news has reached us of the complete success of the revolution in Peru. Gen. Canseco is now undisputed President of the country, and the late hostile army of the weak and infamous Pezet is incorporated with his forces, under the command of Col. Prado. This triumph of the republican principle in Peru, involves a declaration of war against Spain by that country, which will at once array itself by the side of Chile, in her manly struggle against European aggression.

THE PATTER OF LITTLE FEET.

BY J. W. WATSON.

OVER my head, in the morning early,
I heard the patter of little feet,
Rising above the hurly-burly
Out in the fast awakening street.
I like my nap in the morning early,
That drowsy, sleeping, waking time,
And am apt to give way to a touch of the surly,
With one who breaks on its soothing rhyme.

And so this morn when I heard the clatter,
I turned uneasily in my bed,
And bothered my brain to guess the matter
With the little pats pattering over my head.
My nap was gone, and in humor sulky,
I stretched a loud and imperious yawn,
And then with both hip and shoulder bulky,
I blessed the hour those babes were born.

With a knitted brow and a hasty toilet,
I made up my mind as I mounted the stairs,
Whatever the fun I would quickly spoil it
By coming upon them unawares.
I never had seen my four neighbors,
This only I knew, that the tidy house,
Save and except for these infantine labors,
Was silent and still as a baby mouse.

I knocked at the door, and a moment waited
The noise was hushed, to a whispered word.
The patter of little feet abated,
And a tiny hand on the latch I heard.
The door was gently shoved opening, started,
And full in its light a vision appeared
That carried my heart to the days departed,
And the one to whom it was ever endeared.

Oh, vision of life in the darkened palace,
Where I have enshrined the one of my love,
What vestige remained of the wrath and malice,
I threatened to wreak on the noise above?
That memoried thought is the one I am meeting.
What hands are they stretched as I entered the door?
"Are you my papa?" was the baby-like greet-
ing,
"Are you my papa, come home from the war?"

No, darling, I said, with a choking emotion,
I am not your papa, come home from the war,
I am only a waif on the fathomless ocean,
With no one to love me the weary world o'er.
"With no one to love you," the baby replies,
"I will love you myself, you shall be my papa,
And I caught the sweet child with the wondering eyes
Up close to my breast where the memories are.

Oh, where was my heart as I lay in bed during,
And the noise overhead could not quicken its beat,
The chambers of memory surely were closing,
When no entrance was found for those dear little feet.
For had I the riches we read of in story,
I would give up the whole to sweep away yonder
To bring back the pleasure, the wealth and the glory,
The patter of dear little feet to my ears.

DISMASTED.

BY JACK BRACE.

LIFE is often likened to a voyage. The stately ship is launched and rigged, manned and freighted, and then she sets sail for her destination. Behold her lofty masts, and snowy canvas, as they ride proudly to the breeze! How form cleaves the waves as if in conscious strength, and she "walks the waters" with as queenly an air, as if winds and waves were her subjects. Oh, it is a goodly sight! What joy fills the hearts of her crew, what hopes animate them! Anticipation has already seized upon a prosperous result, and a happy return.

The scene soon changes, however, even though the seas are smooth and the gales propitious. Watchful toil, and care claim every one's attention, and the spirit, so jovial at the outset, becomes sobered down, if not dissatisfied. Then comes the sense of power and disappointment; rocks and shoals are to be avoided, while head winds baffle and delay the vessel. At last the storm arises, and all is changed. The cloud of canvas has disappeared, the yards are sent down, and the lofty masts housed. Still the winds howl with fury, and the waves beat madly against her sides, while ever and anon the lightning's lurid glare reveals the terrors of the scene. Human effort seems powerless to battle the rage of the elements, and panic seizes on the stoutest heart. And yet the worst has not come; a fiercer hurricane sweeps over her, and she is dismasted! Ah, heartrending whither will the drift among the fearful perils of the night? Ah, luckless crew, where now are you bound!

The future of John Bethel seemed full of hope and promise. Born to the enjoyment of moderate wealth, and reared by affectionate, but considerations and intelligent parents, his childhood and youth had been made smooth and happy by that prudent indulgence which gratifies, without encouraging the child. And now, at twenty-three, the world was all before him — the voyage of life about to commence. It is true he had lost both heart friend, his father, whose judgment and experience would have made him a safe pilot, and that his mother, with all her truth and fondness, was of a soft and yielding nature, which fitted her rather to console than to guide. John Bethel, however, was a young man of rare promise, and well disciplined mind. He had learning and riches, and moral worth, and something more than talent—he had genius. He came to the great city, the busiest mart where men congregate for commerce—he felt the consciousness of strength, and desired a noble theatre. His reputation had preceded him, and his reception was flattering. Counsellor Affable offered him a separate apartment at his office, with the benefit of advice as to his studies, when he heard that he designed reading law for a year or two. Mrs. Blow placed his name on her special list—her literary soirées were the first in the city, and to be lionized by her was no mean distinction. Charley Blow, the very best fellow in the world," had him elected, forthwith, a member of his club, the geniedeum in the city, of course, and elected himself chairman of the night. John Bethel's interest with wonderful and self-sacrificing energy; and the beautiful Miss Affable received him with her sweetest smile, when he came home with papa to take tea quite en familie. Who would not have been elated? Certainly John Bethel was not of that temperament which could receive such marks of kindness unmoved. He wrote his mother joyously:

"I begin my voyage most propitiously. The sea is smooth, the gales are favorable, and Hope already points to the beacon of success."

Perhaps John Bethel would have received a more practical, and entertained a less confiding sense of human nature, had not his vanity might have been somewhat wounded, if he had overheard either of the following conversations:

"Well, papa, he's not bad looking, after all," said Miss Margaret Affable, when Bethel was gone; "on the contrary, with a little training and polish he may be made quite a presentable. How much did you say he was worth?"

"Rich! rich!" said Counsellor Affable. "I know the property well. With careful nursing, its value in a few years will be immense. Secure him at once, Margery."

"Ah, dear Count Levini, what a shame one can't have money and a husband both to their liking!" sighed Miss Margaret.

"Count Devilini!" exclaimed the irate counsellor. "I tell you, miss, that foreign fellow is a pauper, if not an impostor. So never let me hear another word about him. I will not be insulted by a man again when he calls. A pretty mess, indeed, if I am to find the very match of all others which pleases me, and you are to rebel. I say you shall marry John Bethel."

And this being rendered as the final judgment in the case, the counselor adjourned himself to his library and his bottle of Madeira.

"And I say I shall marry John Bethel, too," said the daughter; "but when I have an establishment of my own, I shall invite you, papa, and the count's name graces the head of my list."

With which determination Miss Affable adjourned to her own apartment.

* * * *

"I say, Charley," remarked his ci-devant chum, but present creditor, Fred Wilkes, as they sat in a private room at the club, "that's a quiet game of cuckre; I say, old fellow, I'm deuced hard up for 'spekter,' and do wish you'd manage to settle that little affair of ours."

There was an emphasis on the latter part of this speech, which grated harshly on Charles Trew's sensibilities, blunted as they were. He replied, however, without taking any notice of it, apparently.

"Pshaw, Fred! don't be such a Jew. You have had good luck lately, and you know I'm never long without resources. I am on a 'lay' now."

"As how?"

"I've a 'fist' in tow."

"Ah, your new friend, Bethel. Will he play? I asked the other with sudden interest.

"No! gosh you," replied Trew. "Never mind, old fellow, we are either or us too honorable to interfere with the other's game. But you shall have your money in a few days."

"All right," replied the other, in the same tone; "we must live, you know, and see and help one another. Sure as fate's loaded with coin. Eh! Charley?"

Mrs. Blow had introduced Bethel to a fashionable publisher, who, pleased him with the most distinguished consideration, and finding him truly intelligent, and well read, he did him the favor to consult him, publishing his views, and the occasional use of his pen. After a few months' acquaintance Bethel mentioned his intention of writing a book.

"By so, by all means, my dear fellow. It cannot fail to make a hit; you have the ring of the true metal, and I could back you."

Thus encouraged, Bethel admitted that he had written a book, though it required much altering and revising.

"Ay, ay! that is the very thing. I was waiting for something new. Of course I will be your publisher; trust me for getting off a large edition. It shall have my best."

The young author was only too glad to avail himself of the flattering offer, and consigned his manuscript to him, without delay, for the press. When he had gone, the admiring and liberal publisher turned to his partner:

"Jones's lucky, Johnson. He is rich, and ambitious. I hope he will hurry up his MSS; we shall be shorn of funds this month, and of course will be obliged to economize expenses. Have me an estimate ready the last of the week. I will go down and call on him. There's nothing for a gentleman like that to do, and how ambitious to see themselves in print, and can afford to pay! We can get off anything, you know, if the wheels are well greased."

A year had passed, and it was still fair sailing. John Bethel moved steadily along before favoring gales. The waters sparkled, the skies were blue, and his spirit was buoyant and hopeful. His work had been a success—a tremendous hit, his publisher and a few pensioned critics said—certainly the former's bill was so, though the returns of sales was meagre. A few men of truth and judgment read it, and predicted well for the author, notwithstanding its transparent defects. Mrs. Blow, "fair, fat," but not quite "forty," was in ecstasies, and told her favorite "loady," that if he were only poor, she would so delight in aiding the struggles of such a genius. And the rich widow sighed as if she would willingly bestow something else besides her hand, even if he only needed them. He could, no doubt, have had the hand that extended and the heart that dictated her generosity. But, alas! there was an obstacle to the aspirations of widow Blow. Miss Margaret Affable had played her part with skill; she had, like a sensible girl, discarded the count, and won John Bethel—they were engaged!

He was also the pet of the club. He would not play—that was positive; but he was liberal, and generous to a fault. Charley Trew declared he was "as generous as a prince," and he ought to have known, from the frequency with which he borrowed of him.

It was thus, in the midst of fair weather, that John Bethel received a summons from his mother to come home at once. Such a demand admitted of no delay; so, packing a carpet-bag, and barely taking time to send a note to his affianced, he was off in the train. The cessation of his mother's rather peremptory letter was communicated to him immediately on his arrival, with much trepidation, by a person who was considered perfectly sound,-as well as honorable, for whom his father had endorsed, to a considerable amount, had failed. Such endorsements were still out, and unsatisfied. It was the first cloud on John Bethel's horizon; but he looked at it squarely, steadily and boldly, and saw that it portended some thing serious, and he prepared to shorten sail. After obtaining all the information he could, John bid his mother an affectionate farewell, telling her to be of good heart, and returned to the city to advise with his friend, and future father-in-law. The latter examined the matter carefully, and finally declared that he would fight the claim, which he was sure he could defeat, or that he should at least obtain an easy compromise. But John Bethel was determined to meet the demand as legal and just one, and paid it, although it took three-fourths of his property, and left him with half his estate, and that part which was inalienable for the present. Mr. Affable was anything but consistent with his name, and Miss Affable frowned, and pish'd, and talked about disinheriting—but John Bethel was firm, and the squall passed over. The real estate, the management of which the counselor so much desiderated, was sold, and out of that he brought he could repair damages.

John Bethel had experienced the first adverse wind on his voyage, and he grew circumspect. He shortened sail—reduced his expenses—and just in time, too, for some professional Paul-Pry found a defect in his father's title to the landed property in question. And Affable now prepared for a great battle; but John was intractable again. The very highest professional opinions were taken, and it was declared that the claim was worthless, although it had been purchased in good faith and paid for. So Bethel refused to contest the matter, but promptly made a compromise. The counsellor stormed, and Miss Margaret pronounced him a fool, and declared she would never speak to him again.

Poor fellow! he was reduced almost to "bare poles;" but he held on bravely. Just at this crisis his mother died, and he hastened to attend to her funeral.

Through her brief illness he devoted himself to her comfort, without murmuring his last change of fortune, and when she passed away from him, and in the full belief that he was still comfortably off in worldly affairs.

The last rites paid to his beloved parent, and he sat down to reflect on his future course. His plans were soon formed; they were simple and straightforward. He had determined to study law, and, after attending to practice; he would make it his profession—Mr. Affable would give him all the assistance in his power, perhaps help him into partnership. He was called to the bar, when he could marry his adored Margery, work hard, and live as happy as if in a fairy land. Such, at least, was the picture, there must be some returns from his book; he would write another, and Mr. Vellum, his publisher, and friend, would, no doubt, make him a more ample compensation for the literary services he had been in the habit of rendering gratuitously heretofore. Oh! he would be happy yet, very happy.

With these ideas John Bethel returned to the city. The storm was heavy, but he would weather it. He called at the office, and was surprised to find that Counsellor Affable had removed to other rooms in a new building; that janitor handed him a note in which he was politely, but coldly informed that his effects had been left with that individual, and that it would be impossible for Mr. Affable to continue the existing arrangement with him, as he needed all the room he had in his new apartments. Giving the man directions about his things, he hastened to call on Miss Affable, from whom he had not received a line during his absence. In reply to his inquiry the servant said, promptly enough:

"Not at home? Yet, as he turned the corner on his way down town, he saw Count Levini ring, and pausing a moment, heard the door opened by a man who was so stupid as to misunderstand the meaning of his treatment by father and daughter; but he had a better knowledge of the count's ways to return and demand an explanation; in fact, he accomplished half the distance, when he met Margaret and the count come out arm-in-arm, evidently on a promenade; not perceiving him, perhaps, they came directly towards him. John Bethel's form dilated, his eye grew brighter, and his step firmer as he approached them. Miss Affable dropped her veil, however, before they met, and the count twirled his mustache, with an attempt to look fierce, as he passed. It was yet early in the day, and our hero proceeded to his publishers, who received him so politely that he thought the clouds were breaking away. He obtained a private interview, and stated his wishes. Mr. Vellum hmm'd, and ha'ed:

"Really," he said, "the times were so hard that he could not possibly afford to pay for additional literary aid. As for the book, it had not sold as well as its first popularity led him to hope. In fact there were no returns to Mr. Bethel's credit; on the contrary, a considerable balance was due to the publishers, which, of course, ask present payment, but perhaps Mr. Bethel would like to take the account along with him."

John Bethel pushed the paper, turned on his heel, and left without a word. It was growing very dark with him. He immediately proceeded to the United Trust, who owed him some hundreds, for the idea of resting under a pecuniary obligation to his publisher galled him, and said, "I want you washing money!" said Charley, with easy badinage.

"Have you not heard of my misfortunes?"

"Oh, no indeed, that there was something unpleasant up, but we supposed it would all come right. You don't mean to say it's a regular smash up, eh?"

"I have lost everything—not worth a dollar, except, very fortunately, the few hundreds which you, and one or two of our fellows, were so good as to borrow. I never was more in earnest than when I asked you just now to return a portion of my loan."

Charley looked very cold, blow, but—stop! let me see; how much do you need?"

"Two hundred and fifty dollars will do for the present."

"How unlucky that I paid out five hundred today, which might as well have been over; but, never mind, I'll see the club at seven o'clock—sharp seven—I'll have it for you. By-bye; I must hurry off."

John Bethel was punctual to the appointment; but seven, and eight, and nine o'clock struck without the appearance of his friend Trew. He rung the bell, and the waiter appeared.

"Some of the gentlemen were in," he said; "Mr. Trew had dined at five o'clock with several others, but they had gone, and would not return before midnight, if at all. The manager had asked him to hand Mr. Bethel this note."

It was a small sum for the loan he paid it in the days when he boy a dollar, and departed. It was growing darker! He went out into the street, bared his head to the cool night air, and strove to gather heart for the crisis. As he pondered he walked along without being exactly conscious of his route. He was aroused by hearing his name called, and looking up, saw a poor literary man to whom he had shown some kindness, and whom he had introduced to Mrs. Blow's circle.

"Ah! here you are—going in, eh? Missed you for some time."

"I thought struck Bethel, "I will drink the last dregs."

So he entered; the widow received him with more than her usual kindness.

"Ah! she has not heard," thought he.

It was a mistake; she had, and after a short time she drew him aside on some pretence, and offered him a feeling of condolence.

"Here, at least, is one true heart," said he to himself; and the skies grew brighter.

The next day she contracted her interview much beyond what John Bethel deemed necessary. She grew tender, and John got embarrassed. She grew tender, and John understood that her heart and fortune were ready for his consolation. With all the gentleness of his truly chivalric nature he evaded the proffered love, and the enamored widow was not to be baffled, until he mildly rejected her suit. The next day she cut him on Broadway.

John Bethel now set manfully to work to prepare for the worst. He gave up his lodgings and procured cheaper; he disposed of some superfluities, which made him a little money. From his friend Trew he received a note regretting that he had been disappointed, but he would try and arrange as soon as possible. So John gave up that, and all similar claims. So well did he bestir himself, however, that by night he was in his new home. Worn out with fatigue and excitement, he went early to rest, and awoke next morning delirious with fever.

The people whose apartment he rented, knew him only as a stranger, who paid a month in advance in place of reference; they became alarmed at the trouble he was likely to give, and so they sent for the hospital.

Poor John Bethel! The hurricane had swept over him—he was dismasted—a sheer hulk floating on life's stormy ocean!

* * * *

But what became of our stately ship which we left riding proudly over the wild waters? Was she lost? Did all go down with her into those mysterious depths where sleep the dead, countless navies and the skeleton forms of those who died in search of wealth on the treacherous bosom of the waters? No, her masts were resisted the storm, and she, well, before which her crested waves subside, and the angry winds are stilled, guided her safely. With mourning eyes hope still watched by her panic-stricken crew; they viewed their jury-masts with patient labor, they spread the scanty canvas, and in time found a safe harbor.

* * * *

John Bethel awoke as from a trance. For the first time in a week, he was free from pain, or consciousness of existence. His head was now clear, but his memory continued. A sweet, calm face was bending over him.

"Where am I?"

"In the hospital," whispered the softest tones he remembered ever to have heard. "There, go to sleep, you must not get excited."

"But tell me who you are, and how you came here?"

"The Sisters of Charity sent me; go to sleep, now, and when you awake, I will tell you more."

Again John Bethel awoke; his sleep had been long and refreshing, and in it memory seemed to have come back like a restored record. He missed the pleasant face at his couch, and called:

"Mary!"

She came quickly.

"You know me, then, John?"

"Dear Mary, what led you to adopt this life?"

She blushed, and in that blush he read what he had never before dreamed. How strange that even in sickness he could forget Mary Worden, the dear little pet and playmate of his youth; how passing strange he should never have suspected before how much he loved her, or that, perhaps, she loved him! How blind he had been to go out alone into the great world, and leave its richest treasure behind. They he man and wife now, and John Bethel is a rising lawyer.

Margaret Allaire ran away with the count, who turned out a worthless impostor. The great publishing house of Vellum & Co., has failed, carrying with it all the Widow Blew's fortune, which was confided, with her fair self, to the guardianship of the senior partner.

John Bethel, however, is incapable of triumphing over the fallen. He sympathized sincerely with the counselor, and has since rendered him important services. He even gives Charley Vane a small amount occasionally, when the latter, who has become quite seedy, sends a begging note, and he knows full his to the disconsolate blue stocking with so much deference as if she were a queen.

The noble ship has passed triumphantly through all perils, and returned to port in gallant trim, with her rich freight.

FORSAKEN.

BY W. W. BIKES.

"Young in years, but old of sin,
Oh! old! old! she sits by the sandy shore
And hears, amid tears, an in years ago,
The sound of the ocean's roar.
"The voice whose music I used to know,"
She sighs,
"I never shall hear it more!"

Old! old! old! And her hair as brown to-day,
As in the summer, so long ago,
When she laughed the hours away.
"The waves flow in as they used to flow,"
She says,
"But he never comes back to me!"

Old! old! old! because her lover is lost—
Lost to her, but found by one
Who is kind as her dear cost.
"You dwell alway in the summer sun,
Alas!
My boat by a storm is tost!"

Old! old! old! Again to be youthful—when?
When she has somewhere buried this dead
Out of the sight of men.
Up from that grave your life will speed,
Sweet Sorrow!
And you will be young again.

Tales of the Bivouac.

JOHN HACKLEY'S CAPTURE.

BY WILLIAM H. MORRIS.

SERGEANT JOHN HACKLEY was one of those cool, courageous and quick-witted men that were often found in the volunteer regiments of our army. Nothing ever seemed to excite his enthusiasm, and he endured the trials and disappointments of the service with as much indifference as though he were destitute of feeling. His self-control and coolness met with several occasions extracted him from critical situations, and had made him a great favorite among his comrades.

Having left Lieutenant C—— at the cross-roads he proceeded towards Frederick City, in order to ascertain the movements of the enemy. He had not gone far when he heard the shouts of the scouting party which had cut off the retreat. His only hope of escape from capture was to put his horse to his utmost speed, and, by making a circuit, regain his camp by a road some miles further down the valley.

The shouts behind him told him that he had been seen, and was hotly pursued, but his trust being one of superior speed, he did not fear being overtaken, but he dashed, turning up by-roads and frequently changing his direction, in order, if possible, to mislead the horsemen; but his efforts to do so were unsuccessful. Finally, reaching the Maryland Heights road, he urged his steed with his voice and spurs, and found to his satisfaction that he was rapidly increasing the distance. He already had passed safely, but as he came to a short turn in the road, he saw a barrier placed across it, and found himself in the midst of a strong party of guerrillas, who demanded his surrender, while aiming their carbines at his breast.

"Well, you've got me now, sure enough, haven't you?"

"Get down off that horse," said one of the gang.

"Why, of course," responded Hackley. "But now as I'm your prisoner, we might as well take things comfortably, and as I have some good whisky in my canteen, I don't mind taking a drink."

Saying which he took several large swallows, and handed the "commissary" to the men. They all took some excepting one, whose rough, red beard and brutal bearing made him an object of disgust. He made a gesture of scorn, and refused the civility.

"Oh, take a little, Jake," said the captain of the band.

"D—d if I'd drink with any blue-nosed Yankee," said the repulsive outlaw.

This insignificantly uncouth and bitter guerrilla, was one of the most daring and cruel of Mosby's command. He never joined with his associates in their carousals, and was always the most violent of their number in his aggressions on the lonely soldiers of the North. He took the most malicious delight in insulting, on all occasions, the unfortunate strangers he occasionally captured. He was similarly known as "Grizzly Jake," and was a man whom no one would care to offend.

The patrol which had followed Hackley joined the picket, and soon after another party arrived, bringing in the two other men who were of Hackley's group.

The three prisoners exchanged glances of recognition, but so stealthily, that the captors did not observe them.

The night was a weary one, and the prisoners suffered from the chilly air, having nothing to cover them. He watched for some chance to escape, but the sentinels were so constantly on the alert, that any attempt would have been useless.

In the morning the prisoners were made to bring wood, and make fires to cook the breakfast, and were also required to saddle and pack the horses of the outlaws.

Grizzly Jake lost no opportunity to abuse the Union captives, and grinned hideously at the success of his tantalizing remarks, in making the prisoners blush at their humiliation in being compelled to wait on him. Hackley resolved in their hearts to seek some opportunity for revenge. It was particularly galling to Hackley, and, observing this, the brutal pest especial attention to him. His comrades laughed heartily at his coarse jokes, and gave him every facility to practice them.

Several days passed in this way, and the band moved in a northerly direction, towards Sharpsburgh. This town, which has become famous as the battle-field of Antietam, is situated upon the Potomac river, by the side of which runs the canal. The country is hilly and covered with forests, and the banks of the river in some places rocky and precipitous.

After a hard day's march the party bivouacked by the side of the main road, and the horses were picketed for the night. Grizzly Jake, as usual, ordered the prisoners to perform the drudgery of preparing the meal and rubbing the horses.

It was seldom that the captives could converse with each other unheard by the sentinels. They were watched with a vigilance which effectually prevented any plotting for escape, or act in concert.

"I want some water," said Grizzly Jake, "here, Yankee, take the canteen and go to the river."

He hung his own on Hackley's neck, and also those of his associates, which he personally collected.

"Go ahead, blue back," said, cocking his revolver, he followed Hackley a few paces behind him.

"D—n your impudence, Jake, hurry up, hurry along, or you'll get some lead in your body."

Hackley trudged along, although encumbered with his load, and suffering from the fatigues of the march. He exerted his self-control to be utmost, to suppress his replies to the insults of this brute, whom he had learned to detest more than any wretch on earth. He well knew that it was his tyrant increased in coarseness, he turned suddenly around to strike the villain, when, to his surprise the expression of the man's face was so different from anything he had ever seen before, that he involuntarily paused. The scoundrel was banished, and the red face were a smile that was genial and kind.

Looking down to examine his pistol, Grizzly Jake was inspected by Hackley.

"I am your friend," and immediately added, in a loud voice, "girl! girl!" Sinking his voice again, he added, "Keep your countenance close."

He dropped a piece of soiled paper rolled up in a small ball.

Hackley picked it up on his return, falling from a stumble for the purpose.

It was with extreme impatience Hackley waited for night, as that was the only time when he could hope to learn the contents of this mysterious mission.

Wearily the hours wore on, and Hackley, complaining of cold, placed fresh wood upon the fire. He sat with his cheek resting upon one hand, and in a drowsy attitude. The sentinels walked their beats with a loop thrown back, for the sake of dump and chilly. It was a matter requiring patience and dexterity for Hackley to unroll the paper, and the latter was the case upon him. He could only glance at it for a few seconds at a time, but he finally succeeded, and then threw it into the fire, where it was soon burned.

How singular, he thought, that this rough and repulsive man should have selected me as an object of his favor. Yet, he could not believe in his sincerity, as his conduct had been so consistently cruel from the first moment he had become a prisoner. Yet, he reflected, he could have no object in proposing a means of escape, if he did not wish him to profit by it. It is worth the while, at all events, thought Hackley, and having reached that conclusion, he lay down near the fire and fell asleep. The next day passed like the second, and the night found him at the approach of twilight, the party halted near the Potomac, and bivouacked in a thicket. The usual dispositions were made, but Hackley could read the approach of Grizzly was posted on the road leading to Harper's Ferry. He carried his carbine on his shoulder, and was not for a moment unmindful of his trust. Hackley received a glance which was similar in its instant's duration, but still sufficient to encourage him to hope for success in the daring risk he was soon to make. He watched the smiling moon until it was below the horizon, and then prepared for the bold acts which might restore him to freedom.

Pretending uneasiness in sleep, he rolled himself towards the best of the sentinel. All excepting the men on post were now in profound sleep. Presently, Grizzly Jake walked passed Hackley, who arose without a noise, and striking the sentinel a severe blow on the shoulder, knocked him down. With the quickness of a panther, he flew along the road for some fifty yards, where he found a black horse tied to a tree. It was the work of a second only to mount the prancing steed and dash Grizzly Jake soon recovered from his fall, and, shouting to arouse the camp, he discharged his carbine at Hackley, with an aim so nearly true, that, for an instant, he doubted the truth of his new friend.

He required some minutes for several of the gang to free their horses, and prepare them for the chase. Hackley had not gained five hundred yards before he heard himself pursued. The darkness of the night and the unevenness of the road made his flight hazardous, but, without accident, he reached a short turn in the road. Springing from his horse, he struck him a halter, and struck the horse a severe blow with it upon the haunches. Smarting with pain, he dashed down the road with all the speed of which he was capable.

Hackley hastened to conceal himself in the thicket, and had the satisfaction to hear his chase rushing past him. Grizzly Jake led them, and encouraged them by his exclamations.

"We shall catch him! He can't pass the pickets! I hear his horse's hoofs now! Go it! Girl!"

Hackley proceeded cautiously to the edge of the precipice, and, by means of the halter rope, climbed down to the water's edge, where, seeing that he resolved to remain until he could continue his way with more safety.

In the meantime, Grizzly Jake led the pursuit until he reached the pickets, where he found the horse, which they had stopped.

"He must be in the woods," said the leader, "and we must search for him."

The men commenced an examination, and Hackley could hear them approach his hiding-place. He could distinguish their words, and their determination "to shoot the d—d Yankee, if they caught him, to prevent any further trouble."

Hackley remained within a few yards of where Hackley was concealed.

"Well, boys, he has taken to the river; so it's no use following him any more, so we'll take a drink, and then go back to camp. I shall know that fellow if I ever see him again."

"Where are we going to-morrow, Jake?"

"Why to Sharpsburgh, perhaps, and wait for orders at John Henderson's—you know the man that lives in the white cottage, by the three oaks, on the road to the bridges."

"Will Lee come this way?"

"No; he won't touch Harper's Ferry until after he has whipped McClellan, for he intends to fight the Army of the Potomac near Gettysburg. If he drives them, Harper's Ferry will be a ripe apple, that will fall of its own weight. Bagley, you know the roads to Williamsport; I want you to go to the 'parson's' there, and tell him Slocum is advancing."

"Yes. What will the countersign be to-morrow?"

"Stonewall Jackson."

"Let us get back to camp," said Grizzly Jake, and the outlaws left the woods.

Hackley overheard this conversation, and was convinced that it was conducted by Grizzly Jake, to give him the information which would facilitate his reaching his own lines, and would be the means of giving intelligence of the enemy's movements.

The reader may be at a loss to account for the inconsistency of this brutal ruffian's conduct. The adage that "all is fair in war" has served as an excuse for every kind of deception, spies assume a role inspired by no virtue, and it was not unusual for soldiers in either army to fight with a fidelity that brought them into notice, and would desert to the enemy with the same enthusiasm. Grizzly Jake was one of the secret agents, and was of much use, as his connection with the roving band of a guerrilla gave him many opportunities to learn the movements of the enemy. His true name we withhold, as there are still men who would seek his life.

Hackley remained in his notch the following day, until towards dusk. He then clambered up the cliff, and crept through the trees to a bye-road, which led towards the picket.

After walking about a mile he came to the rebel line of pickets. He was challenged by the sentinels.

"Halt! Who goes there?"

"One of Mosby's men."

"Advance and give the countersign."

"Stonewall Jackson."

"Right."

Hackley walked up to the guard, who were lounging around the fire, and entered into familiar conversation with them.

"What are you doing in Yankee uniform?" inquired one of them.

"I am going to Harper's Ferry on a scout."

"How are you going to pass their lines?"

"Use my wits. I was lazy I was captured by Mosby's men in the valley, and that I belong to the fifth Maryland."

Hackley made himself so sociable that he was offered some refreshment, which was of great service after a day's fast.

"Good-bye, boys."

"Good-bye."

"I hope we shall meet again," said Hackley, and walked down the road.

He traveled along without much adventure until nearly daylight, when he approached another picket.

He was challenged in the usual manner, and replied as before, that he was one of Mosby's men.

"Halt," said the sentinel, who leveled his musket at him.

In an instant Hackley was surrounded, and led into the midst of the picket guard, the officer in command of which asked many questions.

Hackley answered as in the previous case, when the lieutenant ordered him to be placed under strict guard.

"Ah, you are Yankees then," said the prisoner.

"Yes, a part of Harper's Ferry garrison, sir Mr. Spy, prepare for a hanging."

"That's a nice joke," said Hackley, "to be hung by my own folks."

"That dodge won't do," said the officer, "our uniform is too often worn by the rebels to mislead us."

On the following morning the pickets were relieved, and Hackley was reported as a captured spy. He was placed in solitary confinement, and no communication with any one allowed. No statement seemed to satisfy the guard that his second story had not the smallest truth, and explanations were merely regarded as ingenious inventions.

Finally, a copy of charges and specifications was handed to him, in which he found the circumstances of his arrest were described in a manner that astonished him. To this paper he made his answered the challenge as one of the guerrillas, and that his whole bearing and amount of information corroborated that statement. He was also informed that he was to be sent to Baltimore for trial.

Visions of condemnation arose in his mind, and he became seriously concerned for the issue. The testimony would be sufficient to prove him a spy, and the vague hopes of escaping at the finishing and critical time might deprive him of witnesses to rebut the evidence of the prosecution.

At length came the Harper's Ferry to be abandoned. The scene of industry and devastation was one seldom witnessed. Cannon had to be removed, and earthworks destroyed. Columns of troops jammed the road, and the confusion was bewildering. A party of prisoners under a strong guard was conducted down the tow path of the canal, and among the number was Hackley. He looked around in vain for some familiar face. None was to be seen. Already had he reached Point of Rocks, and the chances of being recognized were diminishing.

The prisoners were halted for a brief meal, and there were no cooks to cook coffee and pork.

While meditating over his singular adventures, Hackley saw a small body of horsemen riding along the river road, and he at once recognized Lieutenant C——. He shouted to him, and attracted his attention.

"Hackley!" exclaimed C——.

"Yes, going to be hung for a spy."

C—— stopped, and made explanations which were sufficiently satisfactory to the officer of the guard, and which resulted in the release of the prisoner.

The information which Hackley had procured was of great importance, and C—— conducted Hackley to General French, then commanding all the troops in that vicinity. To say that he was rewarded for his faithful services, and that his name was mentioned in the report of the general, is but justice to this bold and useful soldier.

The question was then discussed as to the best method of releasing the other men of C——'s escort, and capturing the guerrillas, who had been in their keeping. Hackley, with a promise, chosen as guide, and orders were given, under no circumstances, to harm or capture Grizzly Jake. The whole party of men, well armed and mounted, was formed, and the pursuit arranged for the following night.

IRISH SCHOOLBOYS.—The master put the rather small class in attendance through a very fair lesson in Biblical knowledge, and then proceeded to apply some of the moral lessons received by his pupils.

"Now, boys, you know Donnybrook Fair?"

"Yes, sir, we do." (Every hand up).

"Is it right for you to Donnybrook Fair?"

"No, sir, it is not."

"Why is it?"

"It's a sin, sir."

"Right, boys," replied the master.

Turning to his English visitor, "You see we do not neglect the loudest practical precepts as well as religious opinions."

"Quite right," said the visitor: "but may I be allowed to put a question to the boys myself?"

"Oh, certainly, sir, whatever you please."

"Well, then, boys—tell me honestly—every boy who has been to Donnybrook Fair put up his hand." Up went every hand in the class! Of course the boys belief had been shaken in the joke, and laughed accordingly, and the master being of the same opinion was more than amused, in spite of his defeat, and visitor, teacher and scholars joined in a good hearty roar, which had hardly ceased when the little gamin of the class stepped forward and put up his hand.

"Please, sir, I went to Donnybrook to distribute tracts!"

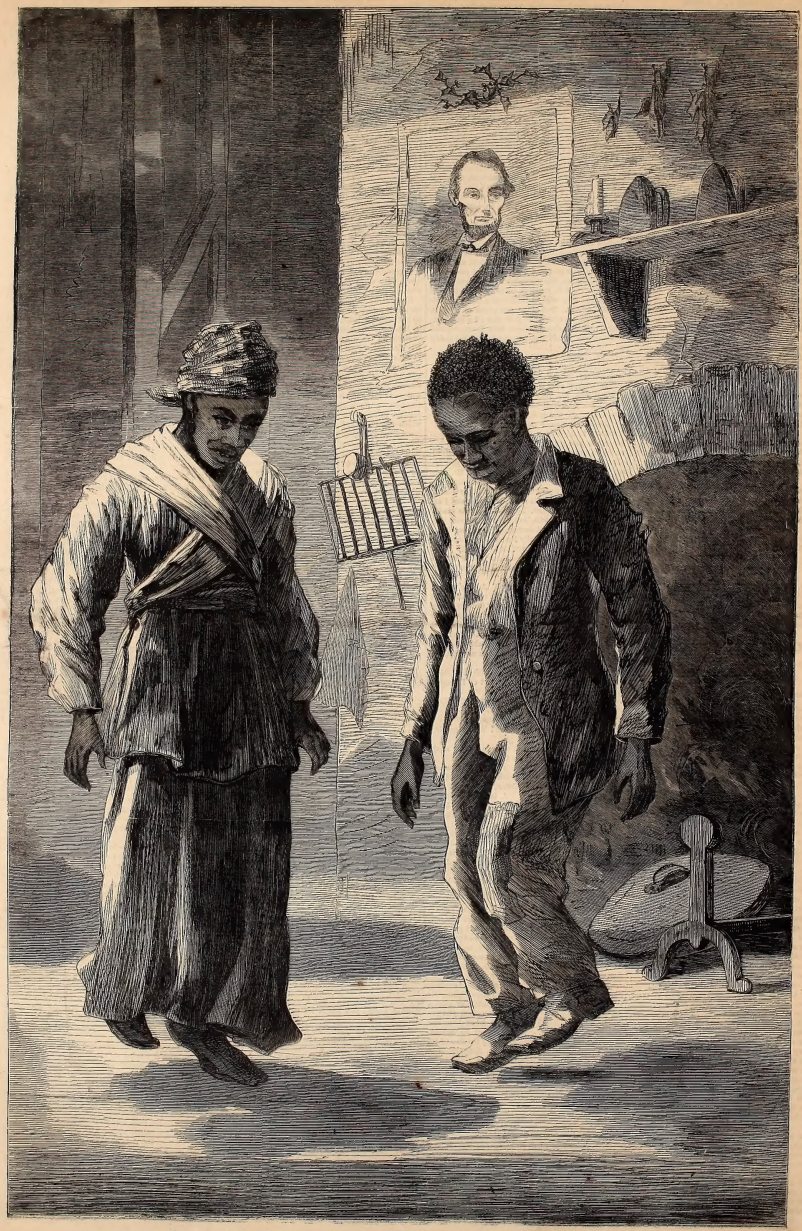
As the idea of any urchin going to Donnybrook to sell tracts was too much out of it's line to be even utterly incredible, the laugh broke out again with redoubled violence, till the visitor took his departure.

A COMFORTABLE INCOME.—If was at the Prince Regent's table that I (Captain Gronow) obtained the best idea of economy. He had no notion of necessary income of a gentleman. Every man present, excepting the Duke of Beaufort, was deep in royal body's books. Not one had an income of more than £5,000 a year. I was sitting next at the table to Sir W. Colin, afterwards king's side-de camp, for fun's sake asked the gentleman what he considered a fair annual stipend for a gentleman. His answer was characteristic.



"A man who cannot live with ease and comfort on £10,000 a year ought to be ashamed of himself."

"Will your Royal Highness be good enough to tell us how a man can possibly get through such an income?"

"My dear fellow," rejoined the royal host, "nothing more easy" the nipped his cheek. "In the first place you must have his house in town and country house, for the ordinary purposes of summer and winter residence. Then his wife and two grandchildren, who boys at school, play a little, and, if he has a taste for horseflesh, he will train a horse or two. Then there must be a good cellar at each temporary abode as well as in the regular dwellings. Once a year a trip to Paris, to see Tolmo and Mars, and a drop at Francatelli's, will be requisite. Enfin, what with new books, pictures, bijouterie, charitable subscriptions" (here again the prince raised his glass to his lips), "the education of children, the tailor and bootmaker, the stable, new carriages, glue, tendeme, and curricles, fresh horses, and—Master's little outlay—the hundred thousand bob goes."

CLOSE OF THE WAR—HULL'S VICTORY, 1814.

CLOSE OF THE WAR—BABYLON IS FALLEN, 1865.

IN THE TWILIGHT.

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

The twilight walks, in robes of gray,
Along the meadows, bare and brown,
And o'er the mountains, far away,
The moon hangs like a silver crown.

The air is full of odors sweet;
The fern is dying on the hill,
Where long ago we used to meet,
And where our hearts keep love-tryst still.

The harvest-fields have lost their gold,
I see no more the gathered sheaves,
The forest stretches, bare and cold,
Its branches o'er its fallen leaves.

And I—to-night I sit alone,
And look, with sad and lonesome heart,
On joys that once my life has known,
Now they have drifted far apart.

I see a face, a tender face,
As pure as lily's whitest snow,
And eyes, that haunt me with their grace,
Lit up with youth's auroral glow.

I hear a voice; its accents calm
Wake sweetest music in my heart,
And fill it with a tender balm—
A peace that will too soon depart.

I feel a hand upon my head—
A hand whose touch I used to know;
Are spirits with me from the dead?
I almost think that it is so.

I feel a breath upon my cheek
And, sweeter than a poet's song,
I hear the olden voices speak
The words I have not heard so long.

Yes, they are with me. All are here;
A maiden greets me with a kiss,
And whispers words my heart holds dear.
Oh, dear are moments such as this!

A mother takes me by the hand,
A father looks into my face—
Ah, they have left the shadow-land,
And fill once more their olden place.

A sister sits beside the door,
And sings the evening hymn again,
And, joined with hers, I hear once more
A brother's voice in the refrain.

My heart thrills with a sense of rest;
No room for care or sorrow now,
To mar the quiet in my breast,
Or drop a shadow on my brow.

Oh, twilight hour! oh, friends of old!
Stay with me evermore I pray;
This quiet calm about me hold,
And keep the grim, bleak world away.

CHAPTER XLIII.—THE CODICIL DISCOVERED.

To Anthony's expression of gladness and welcome, the doctor's stern reply was, after slamming to the door behind him:

"Young man, I hate flummery and—hem!—falsehood!"

"Falsehood, Dr. Pompess!" And as Anthony uttered these words, a change took place in his look and attitude that reminded the doctor he was forgetting his judicial calmness, and punishing the offender before convicting him of his offence.

"Look at that letter, Mr. Maude," said the doctor; and he handed it to Anthony, who hastily read it through, and whose face flushed with shame and anger as he did so.

What could he say in answer? The writer—obviously a woman—was referring to a truth; he had called the doctor an ass to Richard Sleuth. Was he now to be unmanly enough to deny it? And yet, if he acknowledged it, how false would be all his future relations with the doctor, as the father of his wife.

"You are silent, young man?" said the latter, as he saw Anthony's hesitation.

"Permit me to read it—to read it through again? I—I am so much astonished at—at the villany of the writer, that——"

"Read it again? By all means. Don't hurry, I can wait, young man—I can wait."

What was Anthony to say or do?

The inconceivable baseness of the letter-writer, if she knew the truth of the case—that it was a random and hasty remark, made under circumstances of special provocation, would not at all benefit his case, however long he dwelt on it, or however full of speculation his mind might be as to the origin and aim of this envenomed shaft. There stood the angry and outraged doctor, exacting an answer, and prepared to receive it in the worst possible mood.

When Anthony had, with most scrupulous carefulness, read the anonymous letter through a second time, and had taken advantage of every doubt that occurred to him as he went along—to hold the letter up to the light, or investigate the formation of special characters, and so on, the doctor looking on all the while in grim patience—when Anthony had no longer an excuse, real or simulated, for delay, he handed the letter back to the doctor, and said, with an effort at a smile:

"Dr. Pompess, before I tell you what I know about this business, will you pardon my asking you a single question?"

The doctor simply waved his right hand in a sort of sternly condescending assent.

"We have seen a good deal of each other in a short time, I believe, doctor. Have I ever, in any way, to your knowledge, during that time, said or done aught that ever looked liked disrespect to you? Pardon me, let me go on. Have I not, on the contrary, at times almost shown you that in desiring to become your son-in-law, I had a something in my heart that revealed I did not seek a wife only at your hearth?"

"Hem! hem! hem! Go on, I listen to you, young man. I shall be only too glad to own my mistake."

"That is a pleasant saying to me, doctor, for, indeed, you are mistaken."

"You did not, then—not——"

"I have never, Dr. Pompess, said one word about you since our—our relation, that——"

"But before?"

"Nor before—that if rightly understood—I mean, with all its attendant circumstances—could give you one moment's pain, or, indeed, anything more than a passing fit of laughter."

"Mr. Maude, we are beating about the bush, when we ought at once to jump in, and see what it is that is hidden there."

This the doctor said with so much dignity, and with so much apparent willingness to think the best of any little escapade that might have happened, that Anthony thought it well to make a clean breast at once, and see if he could not bring the whole to an end in the mirth he had predicted.

"Well, doctor, it's very absurd—so absurd, that one doesn't like to recall it, or to speak of it—and so one, you see, raises a trifle into a thing of serious magnitude. But the small grain of truth in this mischievous letter is just this: I was beginning to think seriously of—of Miss Pompess, and to fancy you would not be offended at my doing so. Well, doctor, I——"

"Yes, Anthony, yes!"

"It is so absurd! You'll laugh at me, I know, long enough for it."

"Perhaps, if only you'll tell me what it is."

"Tell you, my dear doctor! why, of course I will. I meant to tell you from the first moment you showed me the letter."

"Hem! You are a long time about it."

"Am I? So I am. Ha! ha! ha! Well, doctor, since you will know it, let me own I was fool enough to think you were going to say something pleasant to me about Clarissa, and what you did say was to break out into an eulogium of Mr. Robertson, as a charming man, and that upset me—yes, doctor, and that's about all. On my honor, you now know all that is worth knowing, and I am very glad you asked me. Yes, indeed, quite glad!"

"Aha! Young man, my eyes are upon you. You are a most skillful tactician. Upon my life, I had never dust so skillfully thrown in my eyes before! I almost believe it isn't dust. Eh?"

"Pray, Dr. Pompess, let us now talk of a more interesting theme. Forgive me, but this wearies me!"

"You're wrong there! Wrong!" And so saying, the doctor's heavy fist came down upon the table with such violence, that the vase of flowers standing on it leaped up, toppled on its side, and the water began to stream over the edge down upon the carpet. "The fact is, Mr. Maude, that I feel very much interested in our talk of this morning; and I don't despair of making you share my views in that respect before I have done."

"As you please," said Anthony, with something very like sullenness at the prospect of his ignominious failure.

"The writer of this letter speaks the truth, then, does she?" demanded the doctor.

"I have said, sir," replied Anthony.

"Very good! Hem! Very good! We are getting to some useful end at last."

"I think not, sir. I think we are simply wasting time, temper, and future comfort."

"Oh, you are prudent, are you? A prudent young man indeed, that calls his intended father-in-law—what, sir, what? Come, come—out with it! What was the word? A laughable one, I know. You told me so. Out with it! You know my motto—'Tell truth and shame the devil!' What! you won't? Must I guess it myself? Fie, for shame! Must I dishonor my own white hairs? Must I remind myself of the vanity of—of—hem!—worldly successes and honors, since my intended son-in-law declines doing it, except behind my back?"

"Dr. Pompess, this is insult; and I will take insult from no man—not even from Clarissa's father."

"Insult! It is I who say, 'John Pompess, stoop reverently to receive all your honors—LL.D., F.S.A.; add now—A S S!' Aha! have I got you? Have I found you out? Have I exposed you?"

"Doctor," said Anthony, suddenly, and with so earnest a feeling that the tears almost came into his eyes, "you will be sorry for this, on reflection, you will, indeed."

"Sorry! I'm glad! I'm delighted! Anthony, my boy, this is a discovery, and I thank heaven it comes in time. Yes, I am thankful for that—devoutly thankful! Dr. John Pompess, you are an ass! Well, my boy, if so, I must bear the reflection as I may. We can't all be Solons. Meantime I can joke upon it—enjoy the fun of it! Why, it's exquisite! Make merry, Anthony, over it, as I do. Nobody has so good a right to its fruits as yourself. Come, can't you comfort me? Can't you show me that the wind is tempered to the shorn lamb, and ask me what is John Pompess himself but a shorn lamb of a larger growth? Ha! ha! ha!"

Anthony turned, and walked away towards the other end of the room; but the doctor's voice followed him.

"Dr. John Pompess, not only are you an ass, but, Dr. John Pompess, it is your son-in-law who says you are! Mr. Anthony Maude, in the name of my daughter and myself, I wish you a very good morning!"

* * * * *

Sleuth heard a little of this. He was not, of course, able to follow the dialogue sentence by sentence, word by word, but he was quite clear as to its general purport and tendency; and as he listened, he had some difficulty in repressing the transport of his anxious soul at his success in that exact direction where he had been least hopeful.

"What might not be possible now," he asked himself, "with regard to Clarissa, if only the great blow would fall that should crush Anthony's fortunes?"

But he and the doctor had alike forgotten to take Clarissa's own doings into account at this eventful moment. She knew something was wrong, from the manner in which her father had suddenly left the house, and evaded seeing her in his doing so. What could that mean, but that some accident had happened to Anthony? Or was it possible that some offence had been given by him to her father? The instant that thought crossed her mind she was unable to stay at home, but had her horse brought out, as if for her usual ride, and the moment she found herself on his back, she put him to his utmost speed along the roads and lanes towards Rock House, every stroke of her whip indicating the fear she felt she should be too late to stay the mischief that might be in progress.

Sleuth saw her approaching, and saw, with something like dismay, she might spoil the work he had so skillfully managed, and patch up peace and reconciliation between her father and her lover, just when they seemed about to part for ever.

How Sleuth listened for the cry of Mrs. Milton, for whose action, in the matter of the desk, he had so carefully provided! He managed, by keeping in incessant movement, to watch both rooms at once. The discovery was all he waited for now. His idea was, to go into the study the instant he saw the housekeeper touch the desk—in order to set it on the ground, while she dusted the table; and then, if she did not herself shake out the already loosened and slightly projecting drawer, and so discover the secret bottom, then he would accidentally do something or other to bring matters to a crisis. That was the position for which Sleuth waited and watched, while, at the same time, listening to the progress of the bitter quarrel between Anthony and the doctor, and watching the coming of Clarissa, whose arrival he would hail with joy, if only she would wait but for a few minutes—perhaps, even, only a few seconds—longer, before she disturbed his triumph.

Will that stupid old woman never put her hands to the table and the desk?

No; she is still dusting and knocking about with her noisy broom!

He must think of some plan to influence and expedite her proceedings. The codicil must be discovered now, while the doctor is in the house, and at the height of the quarrel, so as to present an absolute barrier evermore between Anthony and Clarissa.

While he hesitates, Mrs. Milton is called away from the study to the kitchen, and that little fact decides him, as it is probable he can afford to be away from the desk for a few minutes. So he resolves to go out, meet Clarissa, and do his best to delay her till the doctor and Anthony have parted—to meet, as he hopes, no more.

He is soon out in the high road, and she, noticing who it is, slackens her speed, and stops when they meet.

"Miss Pompess," he began, "I am so glad you've come!"

"Anything the matter?" said Clarissa, and in as light a tone as she could assume.

"Well—yes, miss," said Sleuth, coming close to her to shake hands, and retaining her hand so long as she spoke, that she was obliged to remind him by a look of what he was doing. He colored, and said:

"I beg ten thousand pardons! I really wasn't thinking what I was about."

Clarissa believed him, and thought no more of the matter. And then, her thoughts reverting to the business on which she had come, she said, anxiously:

"Tell me—what is it?"

"Well," said Sleuth, coming as close to her as he dared, and looking up in her face with eyes that expressed, no doubt, a very real admiration, but which, under any other circumstances, would not have been permitted by Clarissa—"the doctor got a letter this morning."

"A letter!"

"Yes, miss, and from a lady, and about you."

"Me! What do you mean, Mr. Sleuth? And would you be so good as to stand a little further off, for my horse is apt to be dangerous sometimes;" and as Clarissa said this, there was a something so stern in her fixed look, that although she only appeared to Sleuth the while the more ravishingly beautiful, he was obliged to own it must be taken once for all as a warning.

"Oh, to be sure! But if your horse is dangerous, hadn't you better let me help you down, and——"

"Presently! Meantime, I am wondering how long you will be before you tell me about this letter."

"It's an anonymous letter, miss."

"Anonymous." Clarissa's thoughts at once went to the beautiful piece of iniquity that had spoken to her on the morning of Anthony's levée, and she felt sure that if any woman was trying to make mischief between herself and Anthony and the doctor, that would be the person.

"And what does the letter say?" asked Clarissa, again finding Sleuth's upward-turned, spell-bound looking eyes fastened upon her, but dropping timidly, and as if frightened at being caught the instant the glance met.

"Why, that Anthony, in conversation with me, was overhead by this person—a lady, seemingly, by the beauty of her handwriting——"

"A pretty lady, certainly, Mr. Sleuth! but go on."

"Was overheard to call your papa, the doctor, by a very wrong—a very unseemly word."

"Did he, Mr. Sleuth?"

Sleuth looked at her as she said this, turned his head away as if in doubt, sighed deeply, and then again seeking her face, said:

"Miss Pompess, what am I to do? I cannot—no, upon my soul I cannot—tell you a lie, not even for Anthony's sake; and I'd go through fire and water to serve him. I would, indeed!"

"Really!" said Clarissa, looking at him with a most penetrating glance, but rather as if desiring to know the actual truth, than sure he was telling her untruths.

"Judge, Miss Pompess, and forgive me. I have told your papa a fib. I have, in effect, denied all knowledge of the matter to him."

"And then——"

"Why, then, he set off, without seeing you, to find Anthony, as I guessed; and then I wasn't able to stop, as I had intended, and consult you; for I thought I had better run home, and be on the spot before he came, and so ready to do any good I could."

"And have you done any good?"

"Not a bit. Your papa burst into the room so suddenly, and shut the door after him so violently, that I—I thought I had best come off to ask you to come, as having more influence——"

"What! you were coming to seek me just now?"

"Yes."

"Quick, then!"

Sleuth helped her to alight, and took her horse; while she gathered up her skirts with a quick, nervous speed, as she reflected with vexation that she had only, after all, lost time in stopping so long with Sleuth waiting for explanations.

Sleuth, on his part, ran round with the horse towards the stables, met Esau, to whom—

"Here, you little vagabond, take this, and be hanged to you!" And then he hurried back to the study, determined to precipitate matters by a direct attempt on worthy Mrs. Milton.

* * * * * * *

The two gentlemen were separating in the way we have indicated, when, simultaneously, two things occurred: Clarissa walked into the room, and Anthony got a new thought—one so interesting to him that it made him scarcely notice even Clarissa herself with more than a bow.

"Dr. Pompess, I urgently request your stay for yet one minute. Will you permit me again to look at that letter?"

The doctor seemed half inclined to take his daughter under his arm and walk away, without even answering the appeal; but Clarissa stopped him, and said:

"Letter—letter, papa? Oh, what is it? You will not surely separate in this inexplicable way—both in anger, and Anthony in distress besides?"

The doctor took the letter from his pocket, and handed it, not to Anthony, but to Clarissa. And Anthony, in spite of the impending gloom—which infected his spirit only the more deeply because of the previous exultation—could not but gaze with painful fascination on her face as she read. He saw reflected in that most sensitive and expressive countenance every feature of the letter—the sex of the writer, the allusion to Anthony and herself, and then the climax. But when she got there, he dared not continue to gaze. The fierce and painfully suggestive color that burned in her cheek, the quivering of the proud and beautiful nostril, the scornful curl and then the tremulous emotion of the parted lips—all this so pained him for her, that he turned away, and waited to listen to her first words.

"Papa," she said, at last, "I hope you think of this and its writer as I do?"

"Of course I do, Clarissa." But whether or no they were agreed, Anthony knew not; and he was himself too impatient to wait long for enlightenment.

"Miss Pompess," he began; but she stopped him, with her significant appeal:

"Anthony!"

"Clarissa, I have asked to be permitted again to look at that letter."

"May I give it to him—to Anthony, father?"

Seeing the doctor made no reply, but was trying to draw her away, she suddenly quitted her father's arm, and went to Anthony, to give him the letter. He took it, looking at her the while with a most earnest look. She answered it; and from that moment Anthony felt there was sunshine in his heart, and that fate might do her worst, if, indeed, she was preparing trouble for them through so miserable a cause as a reckless, inconsiderate word, now so foully repeated.

He did not attempt to read the letter again—he merely took it, as if to study once again the handwriting.

"I am sure I have seen this hand somewhere, and very recently. Ah! thank God! I know!" He began to search his pockets hurriedly, but vainly. "Doctor, stay here, I beg you, but for a minute. I cannot find what I look for. I must have put it away with other papers out of my pocket into my desk."

As the word desk was pronounced, Sleuth entered, no longer daring to avoid the threatened storm, which he feared might now burst over him on account of the letter.

"Ha! Dick, is that you?" cried Anthony Maude. "I am glad you have come. There's a traitor somewhere in the camp. Can you help me to find him?"

Sleuth noticed, with a little inward shiver, that Anthony said him, not her, as if he knew to what hand to ascribe the anonymous letter."

"I—I don't understand, Anthony."

"Don't you? Let me, then, try to make you. Dick, I once said, in a hasty, foolish mood, something which has been repeated to Dr. Pompess. Now, as no human being could possibly have heard me but you—— Dick, finish the sentence for yourself!"

"Good heavens, Anthony! You don't mean to suspect me—me!"

"Dick, if you did this, you are—I won't flatter you—one of the most treacherous and unmitigated rascals under the sun!"

"Mr. Sleuth," said the doctor, in his grandest style, as he suddenly joined in, "you are fully punished for striving to hoodwink me—to conceal this fiasconess from me."

"Did he, doctor, do that?" demanded Anthony, with a pang of self-reproach.

"Hem! Listen young man; and if there be one spark of grace left in you, it may serve after both your peace. I went to Mr. Sleuth first. I showed him the letter. I strove to get from him what even now you have yourself acknowledged, but which he would not, and did not. I failed. A less keen-sighted—hem!—man would have disbelieved the whole story, but I saw a something in his look that told me he was secretly troubled, and was saving his friend's honor at the expense of truth. But I got at last to the truth."

"Dick, is that so?"

Sleuth wiped his eyes, and gave no other answer.

"Dick, if I have wronged you, there is no apology that shall be too humble for me to make, so don't be too proud to satisfy me. I want to be satisfied. God knows I do! I would not, for all the world, believe you guilty of this. But before we go further, I have something to show you—to show you all. We must clear all up now, thoroughly."

He went to the door that opened into a little passage, where at the opposite was the street door that had been fastened back by Mrs. Milton during her operations.

Some inexplicable impulse caused Anthony to determine not to let Sleuth speak to the others, except in his presence, so he called out:

"Mrs. Milton, will you oblige me by bringing me my desk?"

The housekeeper—who, seeing something was wrong, was loitering in a flutter—now spoke to him with it, where he stood on the threshold of the drawing-room. Sleuth, with eager eyes, watched for the answer. It was only to be left in—that is, so slightly projecting that no one's attention need be drawn to it. Anthony placed the desk on the table, near the edge, and began to unlock it, and take out the back of a letter, which Sleuth, who kept close to the desk, saw in an instant was the very paper he had given to Anthony; but Anthony took no open note of him, suddenly while he was gloating over the cocktail. For the moment, this threatened to ruin Sleuth morally.

But even while he, in common with the others present, was giving his whole soul to Anthony's proceedings, he was quick to discern that Anthony managed to push the desk—which Anthony forgot all about when he had drawn forth the paper he wanted—so much over the edge of the table as one corner, that it would be easy for any one brushing hastily by, to sweep the desk off, almost before they might be aware of its precarious position.

"Dr. Pompess, do you recognize the handwriting?"

And Anthony went to the doctor, whose curiosity could not resist this appeal.

"Eh? Yes; it's the same as on the letter."

"Clarissa, do you recognize it? Pray, look at the two together."

Clarissa did so, and was quite sure they were by the same writer.

"Mrs. Milton, will you look?" said Anthony.

"Now—now!" thought Sleuth. But though the housekeeper found herself compelled, by Sleuth's apparent inattention, to go not only between Sleuth and the table, where there was really hardly room for her to pass, but also to go so close to the letter as to turn the desk a little round, as if moving on a pivot, still it did not fall.

Mrs. Milton was of the general opinion as to the handwriting.

"Now, Dick, it is your turn; but I take no mean advantage. I tell you beforehand, and that you may express your opinion as you please, that it was you who gave me that paper."

"Me! Anthony. Dear me! let me look at it!"

He came, and spread his left hand that in concert he was not able to tilt over that desk, and bring all this unpleasant business to a sudden end. But sentinel-like it stood, and remained between self from the most dangerous positions. And now when disgraceful exposure of his arts was apparently inevitable, he exhibited a master-stroke of cunning invention. He just gave one glance at the paper in Anthony's outstretched hands, and then said, with perfectly that carried conviction to all the persons present:

"Yes, Anthony, I know that; and since you would not keep the secret yourself, I don't know why I should any longer. That is the outside of a letter which I received—the exact counterpart of the one you have, Dr. Pompess, and which I contrive to conceal from you, because I thought it would pain you so very much, and because I thought, if the matter came to me, I could, perhaps, prevent his ever thinking of the matter any more."

Every one felt the explanation was perfect. As to Anthony, though it took him a little time to believe that the fast-growing doubts that had sullied his name were all unreal in themselves, and cruelly—monstrously unjust to his cousin, he had come to the same conclusion after a pause; and he went and put both his hands on Sleuth's shoulder, as he stood with his back towards him, and said in tones of deep emotion:

"Dick, you may forgive me, but I never can forgive myself."

"Take care!" suddenly calls out Sleuth, as Mrs. Milton is re-passing the table; and then, before Mrs. Milton can discover what is amiss, though she turns round very suddenly, Sleuth's unseen hand—even while he is gazing back over his shoulder to Anthony—just manages to touch the desk, as if Mrs. Milton had done it, and it is gone, with a great crash.

Instantly Sleuth stoops, and picks it up, and as he replaces it on the table, there is the drawer hanging half out, and, from the lower part of it, the bottom, the false bottom drops, and lets forth the all-important paper.

Sleuth does not stoop for that. Anthony, who had stared with surprise to see a false bottom to the drawer, which had never before been known to him, also saw the paper fall, and he bent to take it up.

Scientific heart was beating fast as he tried still to seem unconscious till the critical moment for action should come—as for instance, if Anthony should try to conceal the paper. But he had carefully weighed every action and word long beforehand. The moment he saw the paper in Anthony's fingers, he came down, and said, in accents that he could not keep steady:

"What's that, I wonder, that was so carefully concealed?" Then, laying one hand on Anthony's arm, he suddenly snatched at the paper. Anthony shook him off with such violence, that Sleuth was thrown to the floor; but he was not to be so foiled, and while he lay half stunned, for a moment, by the violence of the shock, he shouted out, and in a voice that was almost screaming with excitement:

"It's the cocktail! Take it from him! It's mine! It's discovered at last! Doctor—Miss Pompess, help me! It's mine! It's the cocktail discovered at last, that my uncle told me on his deathbed he had made!"

Years afterwards, in her lonesome Cumberland home, the old housekeeper remembered that picture in the alderman's drawing-room. The quiet garden in the sunset light which formed its background, the rich, mellow sunbeam, that deepened the amber of the curtains, the color of the violet carpet, of Clarissa's soft-purple habit, and that brightened to gold her bands of pale hair as she stood close to Anthony—to whom she had gone immediately after Sleuth's outcry, and had laid her little hand on his arm—the doctor standing speechless and motionless in his amazement; all but the background which remained the same, the trembling knees by the place where the desk had fallen; all this she saw, and remembered; but one figure that she saw, and that she remembered brightened to gold her bands of pale hair as she stood close to Anthony—to whom she had gone immediately after Sleuth's outcry, and had laid her little hand on his arm—the doctor standing speechless and motionless in his amazement; all but the background which remained the same, the trembling knees by the place where the desk had fallen; all this she saw, and remembered; but one figure that she saw, and that she remembered, was Sleuth, as he lay half stunned, for a moment, by the violence of the shock, he shouted out, and in a voice that was almost screaming with excitement:

THE MOTHER'S GRIEF.

BY J. B. SWETT.

O, the tempest winds as they sough and sweep
Over the prairie wild,
Sing wailing dirges, as I cannot sleep
For I'm thinking of my child.

No word, no line has my Johnnie sent
Since he went away from me,
And God only knows what a life I've spent,
Of doubting and misery.

The war! the war! 'tis a fearful thing!
O, how many hearts have bled—
How dire are the sorrows its workings bring
On more than one mother's head?
I know it is fully for such as we;
He'll never come back for tears;
But a mother's love is a thing too deep
To fade in a few short years.
And my tears will flow, and my heart will ache,
And memory ne'er for an hour forsake.
Remembrance brings me the past to-day,

With a bounding step and a spirit warm,
And my heart grows cold, and my joy is fled,
When I know that my darling boy is dead.
And in the night when the tempests sweep
Over the prairie wild,
They sing and sough, and I cannot sleep,
For I'm thinking of my child.

Ireland in '98.

Gray-haired and weak-limbed, are those who remain to us of the farmer heroes, who defended, with life and limb, their firesides, in the religious troubles of 1798.

Many a harrowing incident has been related, by eye-witnesses and actors, to the deep peril, of heroic fortitude, of almost impossible escapes connected with the atrocious "troubles."

Among the most vivid relates from the lips of an aged woman, who was herself one of the actors in the drama, and it was always with a shuddering and nervous lip, that she related the revenge of Paxton on "Bloody O'Brien."

To give the readers an idea of the terrible nature of the revenge, and the cause of it, I must ask them to accompany me, immediately, to a small, unpretending hamlet, or, as it is called in Ireland, townland, in one of the wildest and most rugged portions of the County Down.

Rising on three sides of a beautiful and fertile valley, with almost Alpine grandeur, and Highland ruggedness, are the mountains, and picturesque kinks of trees indigenous to that portion of the "Emerald Isle," were uneven, craggy mountains, jutting out in all sides, and every conceivable shape, and rendering it dangerous to even the hardy sons of Derry to cross them, unless in the old well-known and beaten paths.

On the fourth side stretched a long, low plain of level country, apparently a continuation of the Lagan— valley itself, coursed its entire length by a stream of no mean size and great rapidity, having its rise among the aforementioned hills, and watering the whole plain. It was from the open side that the "Ribbonmen" were wont to descend upon the peaceful inhabitants, killing and maiming all who, in any way, opposed their progress, robbing the farmers, and driving off their cattle, &c., to feed their own vile brood.

One pleasant summer evening, after having toiled incessantly the long day through, the family of Fergus Paxton were at their evening meal, in his substantial and well provided farm house. The family, consisting of the old man, as he was called, his wife, a daughter, and two sons, both of age to assist him on the farm, were engaged in conversation regarding the movements of O'Brien and his gang, who, after a quiet season, had shown signs of again engaging in the bloody work of exterminating the "Orangemen," root and branch.

"Av it's true," remarked the old man, "ye'd bether be poles'in' up the auld fowlin' pieces, for the O'Brien sore (swore) he'd have the boy nare a leg to stand on, the last time he came, an' he'll be down on us the first wans."

"O Ochone!" echoed the old mother, as she sat nursing the youngest child of the family—"There'll be more of th' auld blood spilt, and the banshees 'll be busy agen. What'll become av us?"

"Whisht, mudher," broke in Darby, the eldest son, a stalwart youth of some twenty years of age, "it's thinkin' about us, that ye're gettin' afeard of Bloody O'Brien—wasn't it you that loaded the guns for dad and the Dermots before? Place a fool," he muttered, as he threw the O'Brien on the aisqil terns. There'll be place imply at the table in somebody's house that same night." Saying which, he left the room attend to the horses, and leave them comfortable for the night.

"I hope," at length remarked the old man, "I hope they'll not be down the morrow, as both Darby and myself have to be in the field, and we might have ye all murthered before we cud be back, for John here cud do no service agen the bloody-minded villain."

Soon after, the family retired, for in those country places, hard work calls for early rest, and the men is necessary to have a good share of them. Quietly and quickly passed the night, and daybreak found them ready for the "far field," which meant a long day from the house, likewise. The converse of the previous evening was forgotten, or, if remembered, was remembered in silence, and the fine, stalwart defenders of their doomed house departed to their toil, while John set about some necessary preparations to meet the foe if they should come that way. But turn we to another scene.

It was still the gray of the morning, when a party of eight men might have been seen seated at a dense mountain road, about two miles and below the farm; they were discussing a frugal breakfast of boiled potatoes and water, which was, however, washed down with copious draughts of "potheen," for it was the time of hard work and peril for "gaggers" in those days. These were Bloody O'Brien and his followers, consisting of his two brothers, as bad as himself, a ruffian named John Martin, who was once sentenced to be hanged in England, but was pardoned out and ran over to Ireland, Patrick Duffy, Terence Dougherty, a younger brother of Dougherty's, and a rapparee called Quinn.

We shall not particularly notice any other of the party, save Bloody O'Brien, only to say that a more villainous, savage-dog looking set it was never any one's lot to see.

Bloody O'Brien was a short, thick-set, broadshouldered, powerful man, with a browed fellow, with a growling voice, and a nervousness of the hands, while talking, as if he itched to be throttling some one. From his herculean strength and ferocity, he was the terror of the surrounding country, and he gloried in the nickname thus obtained—"Bloody O'Brien."

We will listen to them, as they pass the drinking-horn about, with many a vulgar jest.

"Bint ass ye share, Dougherty, that they're for the field to-day, the Orangemen?"

"Faix an I," replied Dougherty. "More, bedhem, it was Doyle tould me, an' he's working in the nixt wan to Paxton's."

"Well, thin," remarked O'Brien, "Misther Paxton, as ye wouldn't take me offer for the mare, I'll make bowld to take it widout offerin' it, an' av there's anythin' said about it, I'll brak a few sconces in the doin' av it."

"I dout ye go far bayant the women," said the younger Dougherty, "nor any av them, fur that matther, as we can get off 'idout it; blood sits heavy on a man, ye know."

"Hoorooi Dye's hear 'til the praste?" cried O'Brien, and the rest joined in his uproarious laughter. "Come, boys, and it's we'll give ye a taste for Protestant blood."

Saying which, he arose, and, followed by the rest of the gang, gained the vicinity of the high road, but still keeping in the shade of the trees, stealthily, though at a good, round pace, proceeded in the direction of Paxton's farm.

When they were within sight of the house, O'Brien gave orders for the rest to halt, while he reconnoitred the premises. Soon he came back, and, stridulously, bade them attent them quietly, cautiously both front and rear, he cautioned them to be as noiseless as possible, until the moment came to strike.

Within the farm, all unsuspicious of the terrible danger which hung over them, were Mrs. Paxton and Ellen, at the window, and John, on a stool, near the door, sat John, just loading his last fowling piece, with a handful of buck-shot. As he rose from his employment, and was in the act of advancing to the mantel, to place the gun out of danger, a fierce yell rang out upon the morning breeze, and a bullet from the front door poured five charges of shot and slugs. John felt a sudden twinge of pain in the fleshy part of his leg, and, raising the gun, he fired at the now entering crowd. At the same instant, his mother fell, completely riddled with shot and slugs. Ellen, who was at that moment standing out of line, with admirable prescence of mind, darted through the door, while the ruffians were in disorder, on account of the damage done by John Paxton's shot, and escaped.

The effects of John's shot were terrible indeed. Young Dougherty received a buckshot in the eye, which penetrated the brain, and he never spoke. O'Brien and Duffy both received painful, though not dangerous wounds; and Martin narrowly escaped, a shot having passed through his hat.

Enraged at what they termed John's presumption, in daring to protect his own life, they immediately went systematically to work, battering his brains out with the butts of their muskets; when Mick was done, they went to every hole and corner of the homestead and out-houses.

Meanwhile, Ellen fairly flew on the wings of fear to the "far field," and when she got breathless enough, told the tale of horror to Paxton and his son. When they had heard her through, they turned to each other, and with pallid faces, grasped hands; they spoke no words, but that one determined grasp spoke volumes. It said, "If one of us escape get home alive, we bid good-bye to the world."

Ellen's strange appearance attracted the attention of some workmen in an adjoining field, and they hastened to offer their assistance. With that characteristic good-heartedness of the "sons of the green isle," but the old man, shortly, and briefly told them, "I will tell them, I will say and I are enough. Do you pray for the repose of Bloody O'Brien's sowl, for he dies to-day." Then picking up the gun, he drew a bullet from his pocket, and marking it with his teeth, rammed it home on top of the previous load. "Its for O'Brien," he said, and without another word, descended to Darby to follow him, and made for the high road.

Noisy and elated were the murderers in the old farm-house, having found all the provisions, store of whisky, they forgot Ellen's escape, and delayed to drink a few drams ere they took their departure from the scene of blood. They were mounted as they have acted, had they known that the avenger was on their track.

Gathered round the table, in the large room, they did not hear the scarcely perceptible sound of doors being bolted and barred, both in the front and rear of the house. The two sons of Paxton appeared at the window, and ere a hand could be raised, Bloody O'Brien's death-shot rung through the room, his marked bullet had done its work. Darby from another window let fly his aim and John Martin escaped the gallows for good Dougherty knowing what something must done, and, having hastened to his horse, one door to another, yelling like one possessed:

"We're trapped. Holy Mary stand betune us and harm."

Again the forms appeared at the windows, and Duffy and Quinn lay writhing in the agonies of death.

The two younger O'Briens and Jerry Dougherty were all that were left of the heroic eight, who came to murder women and children. They prayed and howled for mercy, how they crossed themselves, and swore to be Paxton's slaves for life if their lives were but spared. Never words, there are no ears to hear you, no hearts open to mercy.

Again those two almost simultaneous reports rang out, and Jerry Dougherty lay quiet, while one of the O'Brien's fell upon the table, the life stream gushing from his breast. Only then did those demons of vengeance pause, and Darby spoke:

"Th' thrue fur the last wan, father."

"Ye've done it then," replied Paxton.

Then, while the horror-stricken wretch sat trembling, they unbolted the doors, and procured a stout cord, O'Brien made no resistance as the cord was fixed round his legs; he rather dragged him forth, and placed the noose around his neck. Then only did the full horror of his situation strike him, and he shrieked his piteous cries for mercy almost deafened his judges.

"O'Brien," said Paxton, in a solemn tone, "you have no hope of mercy, you have been a shameful boy," and the old man's voice faltered; "by his side lies the being I swore to protect. They never hurted a hair of my head, but have assisted many a poor starvin' victim of persecuted. Yet ye had it in yer hearts to kill him, an' ye have murthered his wife as well. O'Brien, av ye have any prayers say them, for you are to die."

The miserable wretch fell on his knees, but could say no prayer, then crossed his forehead and breast, but no words issued from his lips. He was as pale as Paxton himself. The old man could wait no longer, but gave the signal, and O'Brien was dangling ten feet from the earth he had so polluted with his presence.

The old homestead was sold soon afterwards, and Ellen, accompanied by Paxton and Eden, sailed for America. It was from Ellen's lips I learned this sketch, as she sat in her easy chair in Cork. The names are not the true ones, but the story is a fact.

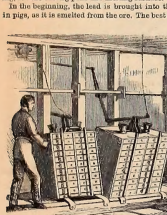
THEIR LITTLE CAME.

Not long since an eminent divine in the State of Connecticut, (we do not mention dates, names or places), visited a distant town for the purpose of preaching the dedicatory sermon in a new church. Court was in session, and the meeting-house for worship and lawyers congregated in a room, and caused themselves by their noise to disturb the sitting. The divine, at the request of P., a lawyer, visited the room. Coming upon the lawyers, he requested them to be quiet in their discourses and w——g. The divine looked on awhile, and then, with a smile, invited the gentlemen present to attend the church next day and hear his preach. This they promised to do. The preacher kept his word, and lawyers seated in the "amen corner."

The text of the divine announced: "Friends, the children of this town have built a fine church; there is still room. Come, for all things are now ready." The contribution box was passed, and the lawyers, with a shrug, whisper, and sneer, threw their pennies into the box. "Now, where men are so," each other, "go it blind," and "call the hand."

VISIT TO A SHOT TOWER—HOW SHOT IS MADE.

MAKING THE TEMPER.



WHAT I SAW AT A SHOT FACTORY.

THIS is no lecture on gunnery, no treatise on the art and mystery of bringing down quail or woodcock, in a scientific way, on the wing, but simply, as its title purports, a tale of shot, and how a good deal is made.

All persons who have been in New York, cannot fail to have noticed, in different parts of the city, high, round towers, rearing their heads several hundred feet into the sky, with small windows, and iron-bound sides. One of these is upon the East river, far up, another in the lower part of the city, and the third, which we are about to speak of, about midway in the business part of the town. These are what are commonly known as shot towers, or places built especially for the casting of shot—a manufacture that requires a great height for the fall of the lead, that it may achieve that rotundity so necessary towards its ultimate mission.

The tower we illustrate, is in Centre street, near Pearl, and is that of the New York Lead Company. It is 200 feet in height, about 40 feet in diameter at the base, and 25 at the summit, and divided into seven compartments or stories, which are reached by a circular iron stairway. On the lowest, or ground floor, and the first above it, the principal portion of the manufacture is carried on, the upper stories only making the height of the building, for the casting pans and melting furnace.

In the beginning, the lead is brought into the factory in its pure state, in pigs, as it is smelted from the ore. The best lead is from our own mines, the Galena lead being counted A No. 1, but this article not being always obtainable in the market, foreign leads are used, the German and Spanish being first.

SEPARATING SIZES.

The first process is that of making what is termed "temper." Temper is a mixture of crude arsenic and lead, in the proportion of about twenty-five pounds of arsenic to one ton of lead. The mixture is made by melting in a kettle, skimming and stirring, until the material blends. It is then cast in bars or pigs, the same as lead. In mixing these ingredients, great care has to be used, so that the attendant shall not breathe too freely of the fumes. In the first case, a cover is used, with a chimney to conduct away the fumes, so that the man working upon it only can breathe the fumes while he is stirring or skimming the kettle. To keep the arsenic, which is lighter than the lead, from rising, an iron block is strapped across the kettle, and boiled down.

When this temper is made and cast, it is transported to the upper stories for the melting furnaces, of which there are two, one on the fifth, the other on the seventh story, where it is mixed with the lead, in the proportion of one ton of temper, to three tons of lead. The object of this temper is to shorten the lead, and cause it to drop off in globules; whereas, if pure, the lead would assume various shapes. The casting pans, which are nothing more than a domestic colender, or round pan, with holes through the bottom, the holes graduated according to the size of shot wanted.

This casting pan is hung suspended over an opening in the floor, which opening goes through the floor of every story leading down to the ground floor, upon which, directly under, is a well of water. Beside the casting pan, in the fifth or seventh stories, is a furnace and kettle, for melting the lead. This lead is dipped out with a long-handled dipper, and thrown into the casting pan. From that it oozes through the holes at the bottom, having much the appearance of dropping quicksilver, and falls through the opening, down to the ground floor, where it is received in the well, and instantly becomes cooled. This casting pan must be kept continually stirred and full, and, if growing any way cool, the lead must be dipped out and thrown back in the kettle, and replaced with hot. In the morning, on commencing work, the scum, or solid piece that came from the pan on the previous night, must be reduced in the pan, and the lead allowed slowly to percolate through it, to get the pan in working order.

The embryo shot having found its way into the well, and become cool, the means is now put at work to fish it out. This is done by an elevator, or series of small buckets, running over a wheel, which, going through the well, dip the shot and convey it quietly to the drying tables—long metal tables, with a raised edge, heated from below, which, being kept in motion by men stirring, in a few minutes dissipates the moisture, and turns of the shot to the screeners, which are simply a series of tables set upon a slight angle, with openings between each. The shot is scattered upon the upper table and rolls down. If it is perfect and round, it rolls rapidly, skipping in its flight these openings, until it reaches a box below. If it is uneven, it halts and bobbles, cannot roll fast, and as a consequence, falls through one of these openings, and is received into a box, to go back to the melting kettle.

Those that are perfect, are now taken from the final box, and though a certain size may have been used to cast, yet it will be found that the shot are not all of that size, but varying considerably, the task now comes to seperate the sizes.

CASTING SHOT.

This is done by transferring them to machines called "separators," which are a series of drawers, very much the same as a domestic bureau, and are kept rocking backward and forward by machinery. The shot is poured into the upper drawer, the bottom of which is of sheet iron, perforated with holes of a certain size. The next drawer below has still smaller holes, the one below that a size smaller, and so on. The perfect shot, which we will say, for example, was cast for No. 1, is thrown into the upper drawer. The motion throws the shot rapidly across the holes, letting all that are not of the largest size through the holes into the next box, and so downward, until they can go no farther. The drawers are then taken out, and the shot being assorted, is placed in the different receptacles.

The next process is that of polishing, which is done by pouring the shot into irregular, angular iron boxes, called "polishers," which continually revolve. These boxes will hold about a bushel each, and when nearly that amount is placed in them, a spoonful of powdered black lead is thrown in. The revolution goes on until the black lead is worked thoroughly into the surface of the shot, and yet, so that when they are rubbed in the hand, it does not come off. This end achieved, the shot have a beautifully clean, and brilliant look, uniform in size and colorand are ready for the market.

The next process is weighing and bagging, the first of which is done directly alongside of the polishers, by a rapid process, and from the scales, which are set at twenty-five pounds, the size of each bag, it is handed over in the open bag to the sewers, who immediately close the mouth, and the bag is ready for transportation to any part of the world.

In this way this establishment turns out 15,000 pounds per day, and scatters it to every quarter of the earth. What becomes of the shot, is a matter as worthy of speculation, as "what becomes of all the pins?" That it carries destruction to millions or feathered life, and "small varmints," s without denial, and there its mission ends, for though we have heard of chiffoniers who gather up and turn to account, the smallest of waifs, we have never yet heard of those who gathered shot, when once it went out from the gun barrel, and returned it to the melting kettle.

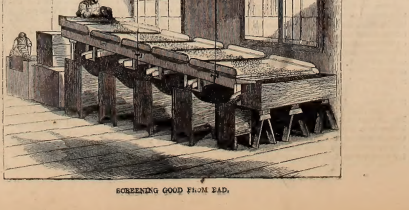
BATTLE BETWEEN A CHETAH AND DONKEY.



WE have heretofore given extracts from the travels and adventures of Mr. J. D'Ewes, and here we give an account and illustration of one of the most remarkable combats.

He writes from near Jaulnah in India:

"We were seated one day at tiffin in the mess-room, when a traveling faker, or dervish, entered the "compound," leading a chetah, or leopard, blinded and muzzled, as a medium of procuring alms. One of our old hands, who had witnessed many wild-beast fights and similar exhibitions in Mysore, considered this a good opportunity for attempting a very cruel experiment, which he had seen practiced before; and, accordingly, the faker being communicated with, and paid for the use of his chetah, the animal was fastened, by a long chain, to a strong post in the centre of the ground. A donkey was then procured, and the greater part of a bottle of brandy poured, or rather forced down his throat. Neddy, upon feeling the effects of the eau de vie, began to make strange capers, and utter the loudest and most discordant braying that ever issued from asinine lungs. In the course of his evolutions, he approached the chetah, who had been relieved of his ocular encumbrances, and was crouching on the ground in a very menacing attitude, his head between his paws. No sooner had this unusual spectacle struck his observation, than with a bray of defiance, and turning towards him that part of his person not usually presented to society, he directed a straightforward kick with each hind leg, full on the muzzle of the 'leopard couchant,' which had not only the effect of arousing him from any dreamy aberration he might have been indulging in, but, also, of separating the ligaments that fastened it.

ELEVATOR AND DRYING PAN.

SCREENING GOOD FROM BAD.

A roar a hound and in a second the c eetah was the donkey, his claws buried in the shoulder, and his fangs in the neck of the unfortunate beast, whose horrible cries it was dreadful to hear. The fakeer had lost all control over him: and terror (and drunkenness as well, I presume) had so overpowered the donkey, that he did not attempt to escape beyond the range of the chain to which the leopard was attached, and thus drag himself away from the terrific embrace of his enemy, but rolled over the ground, the cheetah still retaining his hold, and still sucking his lifeblood. This scene was not of long continuance: the poor donkey soon fell a victim to his temerity, or rather the cruel experiment that had been played upon him; and though we are sorry for the tragic denouement, but could in no way assist to prevent it, as leopard and boy not being a pleasant animal to meddle with. After gorging himself with blood, he again slunk away into a recumbent position, and apparently fell into a siesta after his dinner, during which time his master managed, much to our astonishment, to muzzle and blind him, without any opposition on his part, and to lead him away, the animal exhibiting the utmost docility. The power of the natives over wild animals and reptiles, is certainly very surprising; indeed, it seems to be almost fabulous; but in what the secret consists, by which they can tame the most venomous serpents, and reduce to quiet submission the most savage and treacherous of animals, is only known to themselves. I fancy they have not imported it to Europeans, even in these days of knowledge and progress."

A MAGICAL DUET ON THE GUITAR.

So many wondrous stories are told by the ancient writers of magic and mechanism, that ordinary belief is entirely at fault. If we are to believe what we read of the automata of the latter part of the 16th, 16th, and 17th centuries, the little of chemistry or mechanical invention that we know in these times, but was then hidden in the learned men, was engrossed either by monkish intolerance or noble ignorance. That many of these stories are true we would infer from the fact that many wonderful inventions have come down to us, among which we can only mention gunpowder and watches, as an example.

Among the wonderful stories of this kind is one told by Bonnet, in his Histoire de la Musique," where he gives the following extraordinary account of a mathematician, mechanician, and musician, named Alix, who lived at Aix, in Provence, about the middle of the 17th century:

"Alix, after many years' study and labor, succeeded in constructing a mechanism figure, having the size of a human skeleton, which, by means of a concealed mechanism, played, or had the appearance of playing, on the guitar. This skeleton, after being tuned in perfect unison two guitars, placed one in the hands of the skeleton, in the most proper for playing, and in a calm summer evening, having thrown open the window of his apartment, he fixed the skeleton, with the guitar in its hands, in a place where it could be seen from the street. He then, taking the other instrument, seated himself in an obscure corner of the room, and commenced playing a piece of music, the passages of which were faithfully repeated or echoed by the guitar held by the skeleton, at the same time that the movement of its wooden fingers, as if really executing the music, completed the illusion.

"This musical duet drew crowds around the house of the ill-fated artist; this sentiment was soon changed in the minds of the ignorant multitude into the most superstitious dread. A rumor rose that Alix was a sorcerer, and in league with the devil. He was arrested by order of the Parliament of Provence, present before their criminal court, La Chambre de la Tournelle, to be tried on the capital charge of magic or witchcraft. In vain his ingenious, but unfortunate friend sought to convince his judges that the only means used to give motion to the figure of the skeleton and guitar were wheels, springs, pulleys and other equally unmagical contrivances, and that the marvelous result produced was nothing more criminal than the solution of a problem in mechanics.

"His explanations and demonstrations were either not understood, or failed of convincing his stupid and bigoted judges, and he was condemned as a sorcerer and magician. The unhappy inventor was accordingly burned by the Parliament of Provence, which sentenced him to be burned alive, in the principal square of the city, together with the equally innocent automaton figure, the supposed accomplice in his magical practices. This infamous sentence was carried into execution in the year 1664, to the great satisfaction and edification of all the faithful and devout inhabitants of Aix."

HULL'S VICTORY, AND BABYLON IS FALLEN.

We believe it was Jean Jaques Rosseau who said, "Let me make the songs of a people, and anybody may make the laws who will." The same rule, we suppose, must apply to the dances. They mark the period and the political temper of the times. In this way, during the French revolution, they had the carmagnole, a dance about which has always culminated a horrible interest, coupled with guillotines, the Place du Grève, and corpses.

Of a more pleasant nature are the dances we illustrate. That of Hull's victory, at the close of the war of 1815, was then the popular sanitorial fashion, and from one end of the land to the other was the accepted mode.

Now we have its salcove, in the palaces of the millionaire, and the humble farm house, "Babylon is fallen." This is the stirring music millions trip it on the light fantastic toe, and it has become, from an origination in a negro air, the periodical dance of the whole country.

So that by its dances shall the political mutations of a nation be known, as well as by its songs.

A SHIPWRECK.

The captain rose in despair, full length, and called out "Hmow, throw overboard!" hoping that lightening the ship of her cargo might yet save her. In a moment the hatchways midships were removed, and all hands busy to execute the last and desperate duty. But no more than two bales had been cast into the deep, when a ripple of blue phosphoric light crossed the main deck; the sea was already above board. No chance remained. "Ibbanou, plunge for it!" shouted the captain, and set the example by leaping himself amid the waves.

All this passed in less than a minute; there was no time for deliberation, or attempt to save anything. How to get clear of the ship, which must follow the ship's going down, was my first thought. I clambered at once on the quarter-deck, which was yet some feet raised above the triumph of the lashing waves, invoked Him who can save by sea as well as land, and dived head foremost as far as I could.

I am a fair swimmer, as strokes count, but I turned my face back towards the ship, whence a wall of despair had been the last sound I had heard. There I saw, amid the raging waters, the top of a mizzen-mast, just before it disappeared below with a spiral movement, while I was yet looking at it. Six men—five passengers and one sailor—had gone down with the vessel. A minute later, and boards, masts, and spars, were floating here and there amid the wreck. The heads of the surviving swimmers now showed themselves, now disappeared, in the moon-glow of the waves.

On looking around more carefully, I descried at some distance the ship's boat; she had been dragged after us thus far, at a long tow, Arab fashion, though who had cut her ropes before the ship foundered, was what no one of us could ever discover. She had now drifted some sixty yards off, and was dancing like an empty nutshell on the ocean.

Another hour of struggle: it was past midnight, or thereabouts, and the storm, instead of abating, blew stronger and stronger. A passenger, one of the three on the beam astern, felt too numb and wearied out to retain his hold by the spar any longer, he left it, and, swimming with a desperate effort up to the boat, begged in God's name to be taken in. Some were for granting his request, others for denying; at last, two sailors, moved with pity, laid hold of his arms, where he clung to the boat's side, and helped him in.

We were now thirteen together, and the boat rode lower down in the water, and with more danger than ever; it was literally a hand's breadth between life and death. Soon after another, Ibrahoum by name, and also a passenger, made a similar attempt to gain admittance. To comply would have been sheer madness; but the poor wretch clung to the gunwale and struggled to clamber over, till the nearest of the crew, after vainly entreating him to quit hold and return to the buoy, saying, "It is your only chance of life, you must keep to it," hemmed his grasp by main force, and flung him back into the sea, where he disappeared for ever.

"Has Ibrahoum reached you?" called out the captain to the sailor now alone astride of the spar.

"Ibraheem is drowned," came the the answer across the waves.

"Is he drowned?" all repeated, in an undertone, adding, "and we, the boat's crew, remained dumb.

In fact, each seemed the only probable end of all our endeavors. To the sea we resolved to withdraw: the bailing could no longer keep up with the rate at which the waves entered, the boat became waterlogged; the water poured in, hissing on every side; she was sinking, and we were yet not in the open sea.

"Ibhamou, plunge for it!" a second time shouted the captain.

"Plunge, who may, I will stay by the boat, so long as she stays by me," thought I, and kept my place.

Yousef, fortunately for him, was lying like a corpse, past fear or motion; but four of our party, one a sailor, the other three passengers, thinking that all hope of the boat was now over, and that nothing remained except that the spar, or Heaven knows what, jumped into the sea. Their loss saved the remainder; the boat lightened and righted for a moment, the pilot and I baled away desperately, she rose clear once more of the water. Those in her were now nine in all—eight men and a boy, the captain's nephew.—Lord's Journey Through Central Arabia. By W. G. Palgrave.

MUSCULAR LABOR.

An English, stage-horse used to work eight miles per day, which he ran in about one-hour's average speed, stops included, being seven and a half miles per hour. A wagon horse travels 25 miles per day, and works eight hours. These rates were fixed by experience to be the most economical. An engineer, a few years ago, tried the effect of increasing the work of horses from 40,000 to 44,000 pounds, lifted one foot per minute; the result was that in less than three months out of 20 horses 21 died. Watts finding that the best horses working six hours per day could lift 33,000 pounds, one foot per minute, adopted that as the horse-power; but the general practice is to work eight hours and lift 22,000 pounds one foot per minute; and this is all that ordinary horses can do without wearing out so fast as to make an increase of work more costly than this rate.

The rate at which men can work has not been so carefully ascertained; but we have had sensational reports, that in Cuba, slaves and coolies have been worn out in seven years. It would be a service to science and humanity if the medical officers of armies and navies would keep careful records of the labor of men under their charge, and report to the Smithsonian Institute; and if railway companies and great industrial establishments would employ physicians to watch over the health of their people, and stand gratis, and employ their leisure in keeping such records, it might help to build up a reliable hygienic science, on which an improved practice might be founded.

The introduction of machines, to relieve men from the expenditure of muscular power, has already done much to increase the duration of their powers. A man at a planing machine is a man of leisure, compared with the man that chipped and filed to produce plane surfaces, within 40 years, or less. The result of these changes now coming into use, give immense relief to the muscles of forgemen, and even there is a tendency in machines to substitute the power of steam for that of muscle.

The fatigue and exhaustion of power, and the wear that tends to shorten life, are now very much less than they were when we first saw machine shops. Then men had to do work like locomotives now only do, more than supericised the working machine-tools. Then they were worn in ten hours, thus they now are in 10 hours, upon the main operations of planing.

Then there was a constant transvotion of hard labor. But still we have much more to do in this way. Men at the vice have often hard work with the chisel and file, which ought to be done by shaping tools, and probably will be. Forge-men still work hard. In fact, some men in a machine establishment, really do three or four times as much hard work as others. A man at a lathe, or planer, has light work, one man for 12 hours work per day, with less effect on his constitution, than six hours at a forge would have.

There is no good reason why men should not use seats more than they do in machine shops and factories. Proprietors would do well to provide good seats, to be used freely when there is no necessity to stand.

A horse that is run too fast, or too much loaded, is worn out, and dies; three years is the average in stage service; but one that is moderately worked, will last 10 years; so, if a man works all his energy many hours per day, he will soon wear out. Laboring men in England, do not usually do this, but sustain nearly to the age of professional men, and men of leisure. But if too much work shortens life, too little or insufficient exercise is generally supposed to have the like effect. What we do not find is a fair proportionate amount of labor which is best for health and longevity. Perhaps it might be six hours for the man, and so the very hard work, and 12 for one who does light work.

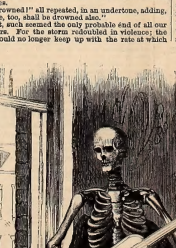
But inaction is not the only abstraction, applicable to men who can work little or much, as they choose; it is a problem to be solved as to men who have to work for living; and in the solution of it we have to consider whether it is best to work men to death, or to let an unhealthy tenement house, or to labor up to the maximum power consistent with health. Is it best to allow men to live in a healthy house and region, and buy good food, clothing, and other necessaries of life, and sustain them with three or four dollars additional wages earned by improved health, or to spend it in whisky? Without the cleanliness and healthiness of the place we live in, or to spend up, or waste away life, in less than half as many or: means to avoid the causes of sickness and premature death. We find that the working classes can get only what they earn; no contrivance will long enable any class to live high and idle, while the working classes are not doing as well. We have simply to inquire how it will do for all men to live as they live. We live in a time of work which will give a maximum product—a maximum of wealth, and we have to see that they will, on the whole, fall short of the greatest good.

Some men work too much, and in various forms, and many more may hope to do so: but those who are not slaveholders will find the true principle and method of making up for lack of industry.

The man who works at any mechanics that work 30 hours will earn nearly twice as much as those that work but three. And if we get the history of industry, we may lesson our hard work. In fact, it is by invention that we shall lessen our labor.

WHEN PEOPLE DIE.

THE following statistics are taken from an English paper, and although the death-rate of Great Britain, owing to greater populousness, is higher than that of our country, almost the same results generally operate in America that exist in England:



The Registrar of the British General Register Office, has completed his supplementary volume on the mortality of England for the ten years of 1851-60, the census of 1851 and 1861 furnishing the means of estimating the population with the deaths. He tells the story of life and death in a way that will be interesting to philosophers respecting the rate of embryonic mortality; but some of the facts will be startling to parents. Out of a mortality of 600 mothers, married women, who applied to the Westminster Lying-in Charity, it appears from the report that though 973 of them had only 119 live children, the other 138 had, in the previous ten years, borne 850 live children and 306 dead embryos, the latter most frequently in their earlier months, just as the mortality in the first year of breathing life increases rapidly as we proceed backwards from the twelfth to the third, second and first months. In the twenty-six years, 1838-63, there were registered in England the deaths of no five-year-old girls, 879 infants born alive, but not living for a single year. At this present time 100,000 infants of less than a year old die every year in England.

"The French returns are very minute, and show in 1856 a mortality of 154 per cent. per annum in the first seven days after birth, 121 in the second seven days, and 54 in the 28 days following. The mortality among children under five years of age in the ten years 1851-60 was very little over 8 per cent. in the more healthy districts of England; in one or two thinly-peopled counties in the extreme north it was under 5.5 per cent. Among the children of grocers it has been calculated to be little over 2 per cent.; among the children of the clergy in 1839 and 1840 rather over 3 per cent. On the other hand, there are 151 districts of England where, taken as a whole, the child mortality of 1851-60 exceeds 8 per cent.; there were in those districts in 1851, 1,391,430 children, and every year nearly 60,000 more or less than in the death-rate were the same as in healthy districts. In the ten years, 1851-60, the mean annual mortality among children under five was 16.49 per cent. in the city of London, east division; 16,249 in Nottingham; 16,063 in St. Giles'; 11,726 in Manchester district, and 11,198 in Liverpool district. There is no reason to suspect that any great number of the children in these districts fall victims to deliberate crime, but there is, no doubt, a great excess on the part of parents, or of ignorance of the conditions on which health depends, and great privation among the poor. It may be said, that the weakler lives are thus cut off, but it must be borne in in mind many of the strongest children are weakened for life.

"Passing on to the higher ages, we find the rate of mortality declining with every year of life up to 12 or 13, be ten it is at its lowest, and from 13 and 14 years of age, less than five boys in the year. Twenty years later in life, the mortality is doubled, and goes on increasing to old age. At all ages the variation in the rate in different districts, as shown on the map, is very great. The mortality of men in towns demands a careful investigation. At 45 and 55 the mortality of London men is not far from double that of men in the healthy districts of the country. It is much higher at every age than the mortality of women in London. Ill-ventilated workshops may have something to do with this, and so may indulgence in spirits and other stimulants. The workmen in all large towns have an early and short career. Take the workmen of London. For instance, at the ages of 25-30, and about the age of 35-40, and again of 45-50, 55-60, the workmen of Liverpool, Manchester, Bristol and Newcastle-upon-Tyne died at a still greater rate than the rest of London. In the ten years 1851-60, the deaths in thirty large town districts of England, with an aggregate mean population of 2,541,630, comprising 7 London districts and in the principal provincial town districts, averaged 71,154 a year, while the deaths at the rate in healthy country districts would have been only 29,459—an annual loss of above 22,000 lives in much less than a seventh of the population. If the mortality of all England is arranged in five great groups, the following result appears: Where the mortality was 14, 15 or 16 per 1,000 persons living, the population was only 86 to the square mile; where the mortality was 17, 18 or 19, the population was 173 to the square mile, where 20, 21 or 22, 332; where 23, 24 or 25, 1,121, and where 26 upwards, 2,599. Yet there can now be no doubt that mere proximity of dwellings does not necessarily involve a high rate of mortality. If an adequate water supply and sufficient arrangements for the removal and cleansing are secured, the evils which make dense districts so fatal may be mitigated.

SCRAPS OF TRAVEL—FIGHT BETWEEN A CHETAH AND DONKEY.

SCRAPS FROM HISTORY—THE MAGICAL GUITAR.

"It is remarkable that some of the dense districts of cities to which the comparatively small mortality or healthfulness of a district is by no means bound to its density of population, as Bethnal Green is less densely peopled than St. James', Westminster, but the mortality is considerably greater. Next to such cities as Liverpool and Westminster district (St. John's and St. Margaret's, and the district of St. George, Hanover-square), with equal density of population in each takes us a whole; but the former has a mortality four times greater than the latter. It is also to be noted, that in London the mortality fell from the annual rate of 25 per 1,000 in the decennial of 1841-50 to 24 per 1,000 in 1851-60. The healthy of Lancashire and Cheshire also declined from 27 to 26. During all England, though the density of the numbers, of course, increased the density of population in the district of mortality did not increase, but continued at 23 per 1,000."

HOLIDAY PRESENTS!

Magnificent Sale!

Gold and Silver Watches, Jewelry, etc., etc.

THE ONE DOLLAR PLAN.

The ENTIRE STOCK of one Gold and Silver Watch Manufactory, two Immense Jewelry Establishments, one Musical Instrument and Sewing Machine Warehouse, one Silver Plating Warehouse, one Gold Pen and Pencil Maker, to be disposed of with dispatch.

WITHOUT REGARD TO COST.

The Goods are of fashionable styles and most excellent workmanship, and are sacrificed in this manner to relieve the proprietors from embarrassment occasioned by a distressing fire. The sale cannot be prominently stated, also, that they are mostly of and therefore greatly superior to the goods imported from abroad, being sworn savage all the immense duties on importation. To facilitate the sale, will be charged for any article on our list, and this sum the purchaser need not pay until he knows what he is to get. This plan secures with the method recently become so popular for disposing of large stocks of Jewelry and similar goods.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE.

The name of each article offered for sale—as Gold Hunting-Case Watches, Gold Lever Bracelets, Breastpin and Ear Drops, Gold Enamelled Ring, Silver-plated Table Spoons, &c., &c.—is printed on a coupon in a sealed envelope; these envelopes are then placed in a drawer and well mixed; then an order is received, and 75 cents for return postage and charges, one of the cards or certificates is taken from the drawer and by first mail to the customer, who will see at once what he can get for the trifling sum of $1. If he is pleased with the fortune, he can forward the money according to the directions on the certificate, and the article or any other article he may prefer from the assortment of the catalogue of equal price which follows the order.

AGENTS WANTED throughout the Country to operate for us. A large compensation will be paid. Send for terms, &c., inclosing stamp. Give your Name, Town, County and State plainly. Address

CALKINS & CO., 538 and 540 Broadway, N. Y., are the proprietors of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Association of Manufacturers, which has been organized with a capital sufficient to enable it to purchase the entire products created from the people by jobbers and wholesale and retail dealers in their goods, and to sell them for which the manufacturers receive, on the average, but 25 cent. on the retail price, or about $6 or $15, after passing through three or four hands. This splendid list of Holiday Goods and Jewelry comprises the Solid Gold Jewelry—watches, silverware, &c., worth $2,500,000 at retail prices, and will be sold by CALKINS & CO., managers for the association, for $2,500,000, or about one-fifth of the retail price, $2 for each and every article, subject to the following regulations:

SEALED ADVERTISEMENTS of the various articles are well mixed, and when ordered are taken out indiscriminately and sent by mail without selection, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the advertisement you send us you are to remit $2 and take it at your option to send two dollars and take the article of the smallest value, from the second hand watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our list, to the Solid Gold Watch, or Gold Pen and Pencil Case, which they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the money remitted, and in which there are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the best article, whatever it may be, can be exchanged for splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $15 to $20 by return mail, or the money refunded, less 25 cents, which pays for postage and packages.

From the Press.

The Great Gift Distribution.

We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Association of Manufacturers, with the numerous Gift Concerns advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser finds, upon investigation, to be very unsatisfactory, often, as gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the big ends of worthless stock, from the second hand watch to Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our list, to the Solid Gold Watch, or Gold Pen and Pencil Case, which they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the money remitted, and in which there are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the best article, whatever it may be, can be exchanged for splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $15 to $20 by return mail, or the money refunded, less 25 cents, which pays for postage and packages.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every regiment, and to those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every enterprise ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will receive their list of articles and terms, and will 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

AGENTS WANTED to sell

The Scout and Ranger,

BY CORPORAL PILE,

Of the 4th Ohio Cavalry, the most interesting and best illustrated work of the day, and thoroughly reliable. Many of the officers of the 4th Ohio Cavalry, and officers connected with the Regiment, have written to assure the publishers of this work that they can confide in its veracity, and that it is strange, startling, and almost incredible incidents are fully supported by facts.

Such testimony will at once assure the public that they will experience a new sensation in the perusal of Pile's thrilling narrative connecting the secret service during the late rebellion, intensified by the conviction that it is true, and that a large part of our history is free people.

It is splendidly produced in octavo form, well bound, and splendidly embellished with 28 full-paged illustrations, executed in the finest style of wood-cuts. Price $2 50. Sample copies will be sent by mail to parties desiring to engage in the sale, on receipt of price, and exclusive territory assigned.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers Agents,
No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Announce that all of the above articles will be sold for ONE DOLLAR EACH.

In consequence of the great depression of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war causing cut of the supply of cotton, and the general Valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE! Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as agents for the principal European manufacturers, have resolved upon a

to be divided according to the following regulations:

Certificates of the various articles are put up in envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out by the person making the choice, and by mail, thus showing no favoritism. On receipt of the order, you will see what you are to have, and then have it at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR CERTIFICATE.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate. Where articles are given in enclosures indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, are taken out by the person making the choice, and by mail, thus showing no favoritism. On receipt of the order, you will see what you are to have, and then have it at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

What the "Press" say of us.

The Lafayette (Ind.) Daily Courier, March 18, 1865, says: "A better selected, more varied or fashionable assortment of jewelry we have never seen than the consultant than Arrandale & Co. are now offering. Messrs. Arrandale & Co. occupy a high position in commercial circles as men entirely above the common trickery of trade. Their establishment is the most reliable upon which to go to the character of their goods and the manner of dealing. Liberal and honorable in their whole dealings, are realizing handsome profits as agents, and if any of our fair readers desire to purchase jewelry, or, like enterprise, they may do so with perfect confidence."

Our Gentle Benefactress—an opportunity to effect for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, &c., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value from a dollar upwards at one dollar each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate at a certain price, which you can then accept and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which you receive. There is more than that amount, and may be $30 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar."—Sunday Times, New York City, 19th, 1865.

"Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be in every way worthy of public confidence."—New York Scottish American Journal.

"We know the firm in question to be very respectable and thoroughly reliable. We have pleasure in giving it our commend our friends to read their advertisement."—New York Leader, March 4, 1865.

"EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is that offered in another column by the advertisement of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in the sale of this gift, filling her own purses, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she has sold certificates, who have found the advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged."—New York Saturday Evening Mail, March 4, 1865.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864: "One of our most safely established houses as agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 30 packages into the prizes for her young, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth more than the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times."

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such can be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided the remittance amounts to one dollar, also other inducements which can be learned on application. Agents will obtain 13 cents for every Certificate, and remit 13 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its cures. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS is for sale by all druggists. Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1865, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 534 VOL. XXI.] NEW YORK, DECEMBER 23, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 10 WEEKS $1 00.

Our Policy—Domestic and Foreign.

MUCH of the uncertainty as to the future policy of the country has been dispelled by the message of the President, the initial proceedings of the XXXIXth Congress, and the reports of the several heads of Departments. These have all been spread far and wide through the press, and have been studied with singular interest by the people. We do not propose to undertake to epitomize them, but simply to deduce what seems to be indicated by them, in respect of domestic reorganization and our exterior relations.

The first significant fact in the proceedings of Congress, was the omission of all the names of persons purporting to be members elect of the House of Representatives from the lately rebellious States, from the roll of that body. Even the names of those from Tennessee, where there purports to exist a regularly organized State Government, were left out. This, however, was the act of the clerk of the House, whose duty it is to make out a roll of members, and was not unexpected. The reelection of Mr. MacPherson, shows, however, that his conduct in the premises meets the approval of a vast majority of the Representatives.

It was anticipated in some quarters, that on this point there would be great diversity of opinion, and a long, and perhaps, bitter controversy between the "Radical" and "Conservative" sections of the House—it being understood that the latter were in favor of a speedy and easy admission of the Southern members, and the former inclined to keep them out until important and vital changes had been made in the Constitution and laws of the lately rebel States. Any such anticipations or hopes of discord have been destroyed by the prompt and harmonious action of the House. In their choice of Speaker, they took a man who had declared only a few days before the date of his election, against any rapid "reorganization" of the rebel States, and in favor of insisting that those States should not be restored to their original privileges until they had not only accepted the abolition of slavery as the logical consequence of their previous action, but had adopted laws consonant with this abolition, and to make emancipation effective—a reality, not a shadow.

Unfortunately, most of the Southern States, while they have reluctantly accepted Emancipation, have sought to deprive it of its legitimate significance and real value. They have claimed to reserve all their powers under the Constitution, even those which were sequences of, dependent on, and drawing all their vitality from the provision of that instrument which recognized slavery. When the trunk fell dead, they insisted its offshoots should be preserved—that slavery dead, its spirit and incidents should live. That the slaves should be nominally, not really, free, and instead of being the subjects of a single master, the helots of all white men. In every sense, the admission of their assumptions would be to make the latter state of the negro worse than his first.

The action of the House in referring all the credentials of Southern men claiming membership to a committee, without debate, shows that it is in no hurry to act on them, and the tenor of the bills and resolutions introduced, in both branches of the National Legislature, point clearly to a determination to admit no State to representation, unless it shall first concede civil rights to the emancipated slaves. This may be regarded as the final determination of Congress, and, in making it, there is no shadow of doubt it represents the matured judgment of the entire loyal body of the Republic. It is equally sanctioned by the President, who would not, however, even if hostile to it, have the power to control the action of Congress.

As regards our exterior relations, the Message of the President is our only guide of judgment. His language towards Great Britain is pronounced and decided. He tells her that we suffered terribly from her conduct during our recent war.

He does not complain that she did not give us her sympathy, which is a thing she has a right to bestow where she pleases. Nor of her encouragement to the rebellion, when not reaching to the extent of practical hostility to ourselves. But he does complain of her acts of war, for which she offers no justification except that her municipal regulations were not sufficiently explicit or efficient, to prevent her people from defying international law, or carrying on war against a neutral power!

The President makes no threats; he offers no further arbitration; reserves to himself such future action as he may choose to adopt, and leaves Great Britain to elect her own position towards the United States.

The language of the President, on our continental relations, is so thoroughly in the style and spirit of Mr. Seward's dispatches, that it may be accepted as coming from his pen. It will be received with disappointment by all American Republicans, who will naturally be apt to undervalue what little it does express. Our impulsive friends of Spanish America do not always reflect that the President of the United States speaks for more than thirty millions of men, an army of a million and a half, and the most powerful navy afloat, and not for a few hundred thousand white men, overshadowed and embarrassed by double that number of Indians. He can afford to be cool, and even reticent, in cases when others need to be hot and wordy to command attention. When he tells Europe that her conduct in America has twice before elicited remonstrances as dignified as they were peremptory and effective, and hope that a recurrence of similar conduct may not necessitate a third remonstrance, he says what will command attention, and influence action in precisely the quarters where restraint and reform are required. We could have wished the President had been more definite in his language, and that his sentiments had come to us in his own, original language—in the form, in fact, in which his notes went to Mr. Seward, and before they had been veneered and varnished by that distinguished dialectician.

But Andrew Johnson, like his predecessor, is a man of the people, who shares their ideas and sympathies, and reflects their instincts. That he will, the extremity arises, vindicate the Monroe Doctrine in all its extent, is as sure as the existence of the United States is secure. The bulrushes of what is called "statemanship" can never dam up permanently the current of the Nile of popular sentiment.

Alas, Poor Spain!

The news of the close of the war in Peru, resulting in a complete triumph of the liberal or revolutionary party, has been followed close by the report, doubtless well founded, that Spain, alarmed by the fim and decided action of Chile, as against the highhanded acts of her admiral, has prudently decided to back out of the war she had provoked. It is said that she asks an arbitration of one or more of the European powers for an adjustment of her differences with the plucky little Republic. Her disposition in this direction will be greatly quickened when her Government obtains the intelligence of the extinction of the last vestige of her influence in Peru, whence her instrument, the late corrupt President Pezet, has been ignominiously expelled. The revolution in Peru originated in the circumstance that this Pezet submitted to the demands of Spain, instead of doing as Chile has done, answering them with a declaration of war. And as the outrages of Spain on Chile grew entirely out of the expressions of sympathy made by the latter country towards Peru, it follows logically that the revolutionary party, having now fully established in power in Lima, will lose no time in co-operating with Chile by declaring war on Spain. We have little doubt that war has been already declared. If so, Spain will find it very difficult to make terms satisfactory to herself with the little Republic she so wantonly assailed. Backed by the physical forces of Peru, the sympathy of Great Britain (substantiated with verdigris, and somewhat coppery in color), and the more disinterested sympathy and influence of the United States, it is probable that Chile will be a pretty high tone towards her detested antagonist, who is now, most likely of the two, to eat "humble pie."

After having been compelled to give up Santo Domingo, to be defied and beaten, after all her magnificent pretensions in the Pacific, it will become Spain to accept her ancient and more modest role—to take what leave in which but expressive phrase is called "a back seat" in international affairs. The silly attempt of this nerveless country to raise itself to the rank of a great power, suggested by her early successes in the African coast, will end in making her the butt of the world's ridicule. And she ought to have reflected that as much as she is lowered in the estimation of mankind, so much will those who successfully oppose her be elevated. Chile and Peru as well as Santo Domingo will now take rank above that they held before, and what was at first held to be a curse will ultimately come to be regarded as a blessing. Who does not believe that the Mexican people will emerge from their war with France, with a higher appreciation of their honor and duties, and a stronger determination than ever to sustain them?

The President's Message.

A document which has been looked forward to with deep interest has just been laid before the public, the message of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

As a State paper, it is lengthy and smoothly written, and gives a plain matter of fact statement of his views, and the motives that have governed him in the important work of reconstruction. In language, he takes up no domestic affairs first, making foreign matters a secondary consideration, and making his policy towards the South the leading point, vindicates the course he has pursued on constitutional grounds, but on those of justice and magnanimity. The text from which he starts is the perpetuity of the Union:

"The people of the United States of America were intended by its authors to last as long as the States themselves do. The Union shall be perpetual, are the words of the Confederation. Its more perfect Union," by an ordinance of the people of the United States, is declared for the purpose of the Constitution. The land of Divine Providence was never more plainly visible in the affairs of men, than in the founding and the adopting of that instrument. It is, beyond comparison, the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man. Since its formation, of their several States, and of other Republican governments, old and new; but they needed, and they obtained a wisdom superior to experience. And when, recently, it required to be approved in the form of an accepted a large part of a continent, and acted separately in many distinct conventions, with a more wonderful than that, utter earnest contention, and long discussion, all feelings, and all opinions, were finally drawn in one way to its support."

And based upon this, goes on to show the distinctions between State rights and State heresies, and that in his acts he is sustained by the Constitution in

"States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the symmetry of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by States; so also were the articles of Confederation. Then came "We the People of the United States" ordained and established the Constitution. Then the assent of States was required, by which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the Constitution, the same concurrence of Congress needs the confirmation of States. Without States one speak loudly, the Legislative representation would be wanting. And if we look beyond the letter of the Constitution to the character of our institutions, the capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire is due in one degree of States. Indeed, to carry for the perpetual existence of the States, is the "supreme authority" of the Constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the Constitution brings with it the perpetuity of the States. Their mutual relation makes us what we are, and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The Union cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures, the States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other."

Upon the question of reconstruction he says:

"But if any State neglects or refuses to perform its offices, there is a remedy which acts directly on the government should maintain all its authority, and, as soon as practicable, cause the constituent relations of the delinquent to be restored. The power to withhold or withdraw a representative government is derived from the duty of the United States to guarantee to every State a republican form of government. Rebellion has deprived several States of the benefits of this form of government. The States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other."

Upon the question of reconstruction he says:

"But if any State neglects or refuses to perform its offices, there is a remedy which acts directly on the government should maintain all its authority, and, as soon as practicable, cause the constituent relations of the delinquent to be restored. The power to withhold or withdraw a representative government is derived from the duty of the United States to guarantee to every State a republican form of government. Rebellion has deprived several States of the benefits of this form of government. The States will endure; the destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other."

And then strongly reiterates the doctrine of non-interference in foreign affairs.

With regard to England, she having refused to the declaration proposed, and we having declined the counter-proposition of Earl Russell, the matter remains in statu quo, but will, without doubt, come before Congress in such a way, very soon, as will bring it to a rapid settlement.

He again endorses the Monroe Doctrine, and discusses Mexico and France jointly in this paragraph:

"The correspondence between the United States and France, in reference to questions which have become subjects of discussion between the two Governments, will, at a proper time, be laid before Congress."

This gives a pretty general summary of the Message, and is business part. It ends with a patriotic declaration in our integrity, the strength of our institutions, and his own acknowledgment of the high duties of his office.

This paper will be read throughout the people in the high patriotism and conservative force of our President, and win to his acts thousands of wavering minds, who wanted the very tuition they will find in the Message.

A WORK has just been published in London entitled "Three Years among the Working Classes of the United States during the War." The sympathies of the author of the work are not those of "rebellious," and he talks much rubbish about the late war, which we can now well afford to isolate at our leisure from that which follows. But the author may be credited with several conscientious endeavors to be fair in his judgments. Thus he finds in Mrs Beecher Stowe a far more frequent name in England than in America; that the people of the United States are universally to be commended for self-forgetfulness in the hour of peril, and expends itself in acts of munificent generosity, and that the worst failings of the American people are less conspicuous and more open to observation than in settlers. On this last point he is very frank and emphatic. "I am sorry to say," he remarks in one place, "that many of the worst features in society in this country are of British and Irish importation; for example, profane language is but little heard in the streets except among certain grades of the working classes; here, however, the new importance arising from personal independence seems to have broken down all the barriers which morality and the usages of good society have set up—and, as I have already observed, this peculiar abuse of speech is not confined to the uneducated members of the community." Of intemperance in America, he says: "When I arrived in America I expected to find habitual intemperance much more common than my experience has proved it to be—and that there is a considerable amount of tippling I must admit I will most candidly confess that drunkenness is by no means as common as at home. I find, too, in most cases which have come under my observation, this habit arises from ignorance, rather than male or female, have been old-country people." In like manner, in speaking of the prevalent tone of land tenure in the United States, he says: "I have no hesitation in saying that the most vulgar, the most ignorant, self-conceited, and headstrong class of men, whether in this city, or up-town, are to be found among those who belong to one or other of the three divisions of the United Kingdom. This lowly person arises from an endeavor on the part of the new comers to imitate the worst features in the character of the natives, and in attempting this they out-Herod Herod in Yankee swagger and arrogance."

We last week quoted an extract from a Jamaica paper, descriptive of the manner in which the supposed participants in the late local emeute in that island were dealt with from an endeavor to avoid martyrdom. George Marshall was hung because he planned a "look of defiance" at the man who had condemned him to be hanged, so no allegation except that he was a "straggler." We have now before us a report from a Colonel Hobbs, 4th Royals, one of the many specimen of the British Christian officer. He says:

"About daylight this morning, in passing through the village I saw a number of rebels hung, and others preparing. I found a number of special constables who had captured a lot of rebels, and were trying the rebel camp. Finding their guilt clear, and being unable to act either like a lawyer, I had them all shot. The constables then hung them up upon trees (eleven in number), which appeared to answer all diabolical, and they never flinched the very slightest."

The last sentence was meant, no doubt, to convey the impression that they declared to their guilt. Colonel Hobbs is enamored of the gallant deeds of Quantrell and Forrest.

EXPERIMENTS of the transfusion of blood, which were frequently made two centuries ago, are again engaging the attention of physiologists. MM. Eulenburg and Landois, who have lately made striking numerous investigations of this nature, have ascertained that animals poisoned by opium may be kept alive by what is called combined transfusion, drawing away the poisoned blood, and substituting healthy blood taken from an animal of the same species. It has also been ascertained that animals may be kept alive, when deprived of food, by periodical transfusion.

THE winter of 1863-4 was remarkable for its coldness, especially in Central Europe. Prof. Plantamour, of Geneva, who has just published a memoir on certain results observed in Switzerland during the winter in question, proves—a further proof is needed—that observations from a wide area are essential to a definite conclusion in meteorology. With series of observations taken at sixty stations throughout Switzerland, he traces the fluctuations of temperature, and the anomalies due to locality in a very satisfactory way. One curious fact which he brings out is worth notice. It is that in January and February of 1864 the cold was less severe on the St. Bernard and other high summits than on the low grounds. It seems that the greatest degree of cold ar sixty feet above the level, sinking lower and lower until its upper limit stood at places below 800 metres of elevation. Similar facts have frequently been made to determine the horizontal limits of a "cold snap," as we call it, and this vertical determination is a promising instalment in the other direction.

TOWN COSSIP.

THANKSGIVING is over, and the election is over, two achievements, which, having been well kept, we must be thankful are finished. While people were thinking of nothing else but the excitements and home joys of Thanksgiving, they can have little conception of what a well-contested local election is in New York. There is little doubt that among the four candidates, or their friends, at least, $250,000 have been expended in the late contest, and even the expenditure of so much money, independent of any feeling engendered, would fail to account for a general excitement. Once upon a time election day in New York, especially in certain localities, was a scene of fighting, drinking and general disorder and uproar. That time was gone by. The drinking may yet be perpetrated, but it is done quietly, and the fights are few and far between the illegal voting scarce, and men no more think of neglecting their work or business to make election day a holiday.

The change is attributable to many causes, the first of which is strict police supervision, those guardians of the peace, on such occasions, being everywhere, and in strength. The second, breaking the city up into many voting districts, so that it will not avail those who are viciously inclined to gather in too great numbers, or stay too long about any one of the polls. The third reason is the general spirit of regularity, by which every man on presenting his ballot is known and identified. That class of illegal voting, but constantly done, or the friends (?) of a candidate selling him out, if they find during the day that his chances of election are small. The fourth cause is, we will say this fourth, Sweet and Jones are running for Mayor. At 13 o'clock, on election day, the vote of the district stands as he is running badly, and will inevitably be defeated. The knew that the balance of the vote that will be cast for him would be counted off by the other candidates, perhaps Brown, we will say, who is then very doubtful. Smith's exposure, so far, have been perhaps $40,000. Now it is to their interest to back out, and throw all the vote into one of the other scales. Therefore, he bargains with Brown for a share for a return of expenses, and perhaps for certain patronage in lieu of cash. The bargain concluded, presto, all Smith's ballots disappear, and Brown's rise. The trouble, by, and is achieved before, had been thrusting them under the noses of the inspectors of election in the city, the notice can be had from them but Brown's ballots. In this way the balance of the votes goes to Brown, and the election is all to the bad, and that is the way a free and enlightened public is managed.

When the election is over then comes the fun and hilarity. The success of the different parties are then either in their glory according to their success, or they are overcome by their defeat. At the headquarters of the principal defeated candidate, the entertainment was various. First came a one armed soldier, who, after having had taking it for granted that his favorite was elected, but breaking down in the middle of his song by hearing the news of the defeat, became a gentleman, somewhat the worse for whiskey, who sang a sentimental ballad of Edwin Forrest's and as much like him as it was like Henry Ward Beecher, and was succeeded by a professional vocalist from the stage. Then came an enthusiastic individual, who had been drinking, and all the time trying to keep it. Then came one of the Irish persuasion, who insisted upon singing "Garry Owen," and when he refused the crowd so well that they made him do it again. Just then the news arrived in the town positive, that this opposition candidate was elected, and the manager of the entertainment, seeing that the war was inevitable, turned it off, and the jolly crowd smiling themselves to sleep, dreamed of the fun they had had, and scathed for more genial climes.

And so it was all the night New York gave up her election time, and the morning breaking with aching heads, and sleepy eyes, and a long, long sleep, and an immense political cares till next spring, when the same thing will occur with the beat and scorn.

From ballots to bonnets is but a short step, and we will therefore pass to them. It is a curious fact, and the first time such a thing has occurred in the history of the United States, that a gunnery have rebelled against the winter fashion in bonnets as originally imported, and have shunned without exception, much into some original vein. For this time the Parisian fashion was gone to the wall, and American ladies are trying to fix upon a fashion for themselves. In the meantime they the present style of gig-dop bonnets takes too much out of them, and the consequence is that they display for it. They require twice as much material as the small bonnets, are heavier, and do not sit as easily. The rebellion has not arisen so much in New York as in other cities, perhaps from the fact that the majority of the oldest citizen can scarcely tell. We trust that it will not be long before the old instinct returns in the full-blooded-ite and the anti-bonnet-ites.

The sale of Christmas trees has begun in our labor market, is the effort being made in the city by scouts from the country to buy up the trees and convey them to the city, the following munificent wages, for month. Ten dollars per month and board, ten dollars and a half per annum and board, which board must be understood as being found by the city for the same purpose as the horses used to live in, and draw the same rations. In addition to these advantages, the trees are guaranteed to last all time but by sickness will be deducted, and we have the strongest confidence that the Southern labor holder out to Northern labor. On this basis, in different places South, negotiations are now pending, and in the meantime of encouraging laborers, and about the rate of renumeration for the same, we have to say, in the first instance to pay. We fear it will be a long time before they will get labor at even as much prices. No doubt the Southern people want to go South, and there are thousands of newly-arrived emigrants who will not get $12 a month, when farmers in those localities are glad enough to get thirty dollars. We wish them success, and every success with us that.

Saturday the civil occurrences of the day was one happening on Saturday last, and involving a question of law. The rebel ship Rebel Rover, Two Hundred, were engaged fixing the premises of a Mr. Worth, No. 81 Pineapple street, Brooklyn, and endeavoring to stop a leak in the water pipes. While at that they discover a loose brick, and drawing it out, a glass jar was displayed, stuffed full of U. S. Bonds. The thing exact of looked around, and in the midst of the confabulation being showered upon the plumbers the proprietor of the house marched in and claimed the valuables as his own. He brought forward his books to show that he had there received all the numbers of the bonds, and declared that he had put them there for safe keeping. We cannot exactly see the safety of such a place of keep-ting. It reminds us of a case that occurred a few weeks since in Philadelphia, where a man put a roll of $20,000 in greenbacks in the bottom of an old box filled with papers, and during his absence, a clerk, wishing to clear up the place—as he says—burnt all the papers, greenbacks as well. Weather he did or not remains an unsolved problem.

This reminds us of a little incident that came off in an up-town residence a few weeks ago. The husband had a dream, in which he saw a vast quantity of silver-plate, spoons, etc., in an old closet. He told the dream to his wife, but was not much regarded. Then he dreamed it again, the same as before, and the wife did not laugh as much, but could not be made to think that there was any chance that such a dream could come true, in a modern house like his. Then the every closet was all familiar to them as their pockets. Husband suggested that it might be in the attic. Wife looked incredulous, but husband got a hammer and went tapping about like a woodpecker, for a hollow sound that sounded hollow. By and by a spot sounded so. Tap again! Could that be a hollow sound? Yes! and in a few more taps the hammer had made an opening through the plaster. It was getting toward dusk, and growing dark, but undauntedly he worked, and at last a hole was made large enough to admit his hand and arm. He put it in, thrust, and in an instant with thrum, holding a dozen or so of silver spoons, with a sprinkling of forks. Wife stood by, crazy with delight. In went the hand again, and came out again with a mug and a pair of ladles. Then a council of war was held, and as it was getting late, the search was put off for use to have a further exploration for the treasure until morning, when they could enter upon the matter regularly. The parlor of the room was accordingly locked, and the silver removed to the chamber. Next morning, while engaged in this very pleasing business, and counting up the profits of the discovery, a heavy thump came to the floor, and the husband stepped into the entry. There stood their next door neighbor, on a very ordinary matter coming out of his apron, and this question on his lips: "Do you know that there's a burglar in your house?" "I do!" "Yes! they have just now broken through your wall into our pipe closet, and have got away our spoons, etc." Grand finale! Husband has ceased to dream, and wife has got over the mortification the value of silver.

Talking of dreams, reminds us that the other day a woman had a dream, got up, dressed, and taken from her a police magistrate on a charge of rubbing her of various valuables, while she was in a state of somnambulism. A man was asked what proof she had, when it came out that she had a mustache, and a fortune-teller also described a man that looked like the one as the thief. The jobs was a success, and everybody knew the dreamer.

Of the theatres we have little to say, but that they are all getting on prosperously. There is not within the last week found the necessity of variety.

The Bowery has its "Frou, Frou," and Sam seems to still satisfy the thousands who fill the house.

Niblo's is still doing a fine week's work in advance for Mr. Forrest's nights, and crowding the house on all occasions with the "Black Crook."

The Olympic is still giving "Monte Christo" with scenery and mechanical effects that leaves any theatre in town an attraction.

The Winter Garden has the "Octoroon," and Clarke as Salem Scudder is pleasing everybody.

Wallack's still has "Rose Michel," crowded every night, and though the play is nothing, the manner in which it is presented is attractive to all.

Mr. Grover's has the ever-to-be-pet pianist and the originator of the celebrated Orpheon Free Choral School system, Mr. Jules Godfrey, who is to conduct a grand Brooklyn, before an admiring audience, on Nov. 29th. Mr. Hudson, the tenor, and Mr. Eugene Fenton are also Mr. J. W. Fenton, violinist, and the programme fully embodies the high character of the popular pianist.

The Wallace Memorial Concert will take place on Thursday, December 14th, at the Academy of Music, Irving Place.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A citizen of Chicago has recovered $10,000 damages from the city, for permanent injuries received by falling into an excavation in the sidewalk, carelessly left open and unguarded. The suit was brought in the Circuit Court, and the assurance for $25,000 has been commenced by another victim of similar accident.

—On a fence in Berkshire, is painted in glaring capitals, "Use Dr. Jones's Cough Mixture." Just below, "Buy your gravestones in Pittsfield."

—The Albany (Sun) Messenger gives the following odd notice of a decease of children in that city:

"He is the father of seven sons, five of whom married five sisters. All the children were born, and at his funeral two weeks ago last Sabbath, two horses were stung to death by bees, which came near stinging many people like to die same. The above is not the only singular thing of the kind in Albany, as Rungold, in the most elegant part of the cemetery, there is this inscription upon a tombstone, and there is no poetry about it either—see Thompson, jr. He lived to enliven the happiness of his parents for the space of six months and twenty-three days; when death tore him from the mountain's brow, and laid him low in the vale, where he was replaced him in God's Whole House, to live and play through all eternity."

—A marksman was driving to Medford, Mass., on the 6th inst., when a rabbit sprang up before him, and on circular, upon the road who asked him for a ride, which he granted. The rabbit got into the wagon, with a watch in hand, the marksman noticed that his companion wore a false face, and before him found a screwdriver to enclose their feet in. Visions of murder, robbery, garroting, and the like flashed through the marksman's mind. His companion was a man. The driver put the rifle by, and asked the stranger to cut out and return it. The circular did so, and the marksman drove on to Medford. When out of danger he took he examined the valise and found that it contained two sawed-off guns, a dirk-dagger and a bunch of keys. He thinks his wife saved him that time. Strange that people who carry valises with them will not take off their big boots. There was Jeff. Davis, for instance.

—Two young men from the country, according to the New Bedford Mercury, were strolling through School street, in Boston, a few days ago, when the attention of the former was drawn by the fulsome praise of the City Hall. "Who is that?" he inquired of his companion. "That is the statue of Doctor Franklin." "Oh, Doctor Franklin, is it," was the naive response; "we took him for a Methodist preacher."

—Several gentlemen are reaping almost fabulous hilary harvests by their charges in drawing up petitions in behalf of Southern citizens for pardon. An office boy of South Carolina has forwarded upwards of 1,000 petitions to the Secretary General's Office, for each of which he received the fee of $25.

—There are now at the University of Virginia 310 students, nearly all of whom were in the rebel army during the war.

—The Staunton (Va.) Spectator, in the following, gives an account of a family wedding-cast that has proved a veritable bethrone: "Many years since, an old German citizen of Pendleton County, when about to take his fair 'frau' to the hymeneal altar purchased a broadcloth coat, in which he was married. His wife presented him with many children, among whom were eight sons, all of whom were married in the same coat by the parson who united their parents. The youngest of the eight sons had seven sons, all of whom were married in the same coat, which was worn by the youngest son of the seven, or the youngest grandson of the original owner of the coat had his blushing bride to the altar in his venerable grandfather's fashionable wedding garment. The coat is still in use. What has become of the coat since it was sold we have not been advised, but suppose that some one is keeping it for the purpose of getting married in it."

—At Bristol, R. I., Mr. Samuel Pomeroy, and successful manager of manageries, and well-known in the stage and circus line, died suddenly on Saturday morning, at the hotel of Mr. Samuel Milner, on Chestnut street. Mr. Pomeroy was a man of peculiar conception of the spleen. Mr. Van Amburg was, for many years, a partner in his business, and their performances and energetic men engaged in the hazardous profession of handling wild beasts. During his eventful life he made many narrow escapes, in coming in contact, near the lion's mouth and paw. On one occasion, while a tiger made a most savage attack upon him, tearing him in the body, taking off many of his bowels protruded. He tamed the animal finally, and lived for a great lot. Five probability is that Mr. Van Amburg received more than fifty thousand dollars during the years he was in the duties of his profession, to show to the world the triumph of man over the fiercest animals that are to be seen in the jungle.

—Gen. Gen. Grant's pay, as Lieut.-General, amounts to $9,240 per annum. With a house in Galena, one in Philadelphia, and one in Washington, he don't know how he manages to make both ends meet, especially when we know that our greenback is worth only about a better about 60 cents a pound. There is only one way to account for it—he is a Radical, and has a share in the economical housekeeper.

The inventor proposes to fire a mine in the Potomac, where the experiment is thrust in. Prominent officers of the army and navy will be present on the occasion.

—A new "warning to smokers" is found in the records of the police tribunals of the city of Rio de Janeiro. A Portuguese, who was in the habit of smoking a cigar, which, when he was not smoking, he carried in his mouth, was charged with the crime of poisonous matter to induce convulsions in a rabbit. The cigar was produced in evidence and yield enough poison to destroy a rabbit in three days.

—One of the merry wives of Bloomington, Indiana, played a practical joke on her husband the other evening. Late, a sweet little infant of six months, done up in a blanket, and left at the door of the house, with a note informing him that he was the father of the child, and must support it. The husband, however, soon discovered that it was not his, but hastily saw the joke when he found that the child was a doll, concluded to cultivate the acquaintance of his family breather.

—A thief, whilst stealing a gun from a shop in Boston, station, was discovered by the owner, and in a moment was wrapped in flame. He shouldered without loss of time, and the proprietor, on seeing the gun, thought it was the "old gentleman" himself, clearing off from his store.

Foreign.—A nurse girl at Preston, who quinited badly, was about to be discharged by her master, who was about to be married to her mistress. While on the happened to go with some friends to the Preston Royal Theatre, where she was treated to the playing of some shocks, which, strange to say, had the effect of curing her quinting.

—Blondin has been lately performing in Berlin whose, for the last two years, has been in a state of dotage. He was performing on the low rope at the time, and, seeing that the rope was not high enough, he was high enough to prevent his going on with the performance of it satisfying his audience.

—At the recent burial of a soldier and a young lady in a town in Ireland, the two coffins were placed in the singular mistake of consuming the two. The lady was interred, and the soldier's remains were carried the following her to the grave, while the regiment followed in the rear, the band playing the usual solemn symbols of virgin purity, and was carried to the grave by four bullies, who were reaping almost fabulous wages the trooper's remains and chanting funeral hymns.

—In Jewlry, cameos will be special favorites during the Paris season. Bracelets with large cameos "parures" are already exhibited by the leading houses. These gems invariably command the admiration of all persons or taste. The settings must, however, be simple and chaste, to coincide with the prevailing gold-Russian burlesque, ornamented with little chains, will be much worn over dark dresses of every shade.

—A colored man named Duncanson, who gained some notoriety as an artist, in Cincinnati, being rather coldly treated there, determined to depart for Scotland. He was received there with great favor, and his paintings found a ready sale. He has been invited to visit London by the Duchess of Sutherland and the Duchess of Essex, who will be his patrons. He has also received an invitation to visit Baroness Rothschild, offering him to visit him at his home in the Isle of Wight.

—One of the celebrities of the medical world, M. Velpeau, gave as far as to hint, very broadly, that in shades of the Asiatic cholera, all prescriptions are useless; that if you are to die you will die, if to get well you will get well, in spite of all the efforts of any degree of Æsculapius.

—At Bristol, the Custom House rules that ladies must enter that capital with sealed dresses only, and that "Crinoline" and "Flying Hair" must be dealt with them, must be heavily taxed. The other day the ladies from Paris did not wish to submit to this, and while the Custom House officers squabbled with a passenger about a single silk dress she had in her trunk. The lady vowed she had worn it once, but the officers pronounced it contraband, and the lady was obliged to part with it. Another lady, that if not new, it was as good as new, and that she would not let the lady had to give way, and to pay 150 reals duty on the garment. We should advise all ladies to avoid Bristol.

—M. About, in a recent publication, says of an avaricious man, that "it had been proved that, after he had finished his fine, he was in the habit of biting the bellows to save the little wind that was left in them."

JOHN T. HOFFMAN, THE MAYOR ELECT OF NEW YORK.

THE office of Mayor of a great city like New York is one well worthy the ambition of any man, and is often a stepping-stone to the Governorship of a State, or the Governorship of the State, or a United States Senator's position.

The present election has been one of exciting interest, and the entire vote polled for Mayor, 81,437, equals, if not surpasses, the vote polled in local contests. There were four candidates in the field, and Mr. John T. Hoffman, now Recorder of the City of New York, polled 40,333 votes, a majority of 1,555 over the next highest candidate, and was consequently elected.

John T. Hoffman, the successful candidate, is so well known to the people of New Yorkers a biography is superfluous. For those who would know the man that for the next two years will be Chief Magistrate of the largest city of this Republic, we will give a brief sketch.

Mr. Hoffman is the son of Dr. Hoffman, of Sing Sing, and was born in that village. His father, who was one of the leading physician of that noted village, and still resides there in the old family mansion, where he has resided for the past fifty years or more of his practice. The subject of our sketch was born in Sing Sing, and is at present about forty years of age. At the usual age he was sent to college, and graduated about twenty-one years ago at the old Union College in Schenectady, N. Y., after which he was immediately drawn into the political vortex of the day, with how much success is evidenced by his rapid rise to rank and distinction. Before entering upon the duties connected with the office the New York bar for many years, and was a member of the bar from the year 1845 to the year 1857, when he was lost in the steamer Arctic, the second in at present one of the Supreme Court Judges, and Mr. Hoffman was appointed to fill the vacancy thus created, and to which he was elected the second time by an overwhelming majority over the opposing democratic and republicans. The firm and just stand which he took in the matter of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners July riots, is of too recent date to require further allusion. He was re-elected by over 60,000 majority.

WHAT HAPPENED TO THE DEAF MAN.

"THE reason why I was so late in getting into the carriage," commenced the old gentleman, "was an interesting conversation in which I was engaged with the stoker. I am very sorry to say, at this very train. Seeing a knot of persons collected round him, and being naturally curious, I joined them in listening to a graphic account he was giving of an accident which occurred last week at this end of the line, and in which he was, from some sort, an actor. He ran his engine, that is to say, over a respectable gentleman in the neighborhood of Weston-super-mare—or, as he termed it, super-major —and of course stopped his train. I never saw a more remarkable in the circumstances themselves, but the homely expressions and dramatic manner of the narrator were so striking that I cannot give you the story as he told it, but produced upon me.

"'I was full as old gentleman upon the line,' said he, 'a walking along, about a mile and a half ahead, with his hands in his pockets, whistling—whistling away like a blue thinkin' or nothing like—certainly, not of me, behind me, coming down the hill with a couple of trucks at forty miles an hour. So I whistles away merrily enough.

"'Good heavens!' I cried, 'you surely cannot mean to tell me that you whistled, when a fellow-creature was placed in so perilous a position as you describe?'

"'I made my engine whistle, I mean,' explained the stoker, apologetically, 'and I suppose I was as sensible as if it was me, sir. I shrieked, I say, in a manner as was a-making to warn him, but not a bit would the old gentleman get out of the way or turn his head, by which means I should have thought he was deaf, only he was not stone deaf. We reversed, we put our break on, and we turned off our steam, but I don't know, ye, it was too late for use, for we couldn't have pulled up under a mile, at least, with a train of that weight. The old gentleman turned round and threw up his arms, like this!'

"'Gracious goodness!' I exclaimed, interrupted, with a shudder, 'do you mean to say that you ran over him?'

"'Lor' bless ye, sir, why of course we did. We was a-going at forty miles an hour, sir—like one, two, three.'

The silence which succeeded in our compartment to this awful announcement was broken by the young commercial traveler, who observed drily—

"Yes, sir, I think I recollect what you have described so graphically happened to my uncle."

"The old gentleman's hair evinced a desire to fly up from the roots.

"He was killed, of course?"

"No. That man has been passed over him, merely removing the skin from the tip of his nose. The engine has been in use ever since, and is now driving the next part of the ballast. If he hadn't been deaf, he would perhaps have gone mad with the noise."

A ROMANTIC CASE.

A STRANGE story is told by a Paris correspondent of a Middle. Edith P——, a young lady of good family, both mentally and physically handsome, an accomplished musician, and who published some years ago, several of her own compositions, which evinced celebrity. As she also happened to possess considerable personal attractions, she soon had a swarm of admirers buzzing round her. Among the most ardent was a lad of one of the most ardent among them some letters capable of being turned against her. A German, a foreigner, a stranger, they will be very soon on the scene, falls in love with the lady, and makes her his wife. Her barbarous, cruel father, who had kept the letter from the letters before spoken of, endeavors by hook or by crook, to get back from her hands. "Or, par bonne bruit, Dieu le sait," says the old French proverb; and so it is a series of circumstances, which we need not be discovering them all; but instead of making an auto-da-fe of them, as the old father had done, the lady, with more sensitive, she placed them in a private drawer, in order to preserve them as a memento of her early days. Meanwhile the baroness finds, to her horror, that the letters have disappeared—that they are gone. She waits for a day, for a month passes, and no clue is found to the thief, till, only a few days ago, a letter was received by the newspaper, presents himself to the baroness, stating his name, and that he was the most persona. And, of course, is the possessor of the letters, having bought them from her father-in-law. Shocked at this, and dramatic style, he demands an exorbitant sum for th return of the letters, which they will be willing to give, that in such a way as to ruin the reputation of the lady. The baroness, overcome with grief at the discovery, and being patience, has him thrust out of the house. This person must be a lawyer, who, using his position in Paris, upon his rets to his office clients to obtain possession of the letters, and the means he tells the story. A clerk in the outer office, a sort of "Bob Cratchit," is the only one who is admitted to it, and overhears this confidential chat. The result is that this worthy clerk communicates the fact to a brother-in-law office clerk!) places the letters once more in the hands of the unfortunate lady, and they will be seen no more. Nothing ought to have done before—she tells her husband that they were lost—and there the matter has rested, which he tosses behind the fire unopened. Now comes in the Police Correctionelle. The respectable man of business, who is being robbed of papers entrusted to his keeping, calls in a police officer, and the clerk and the lawyer are locked up. The matter comes before the proper tribunal, investigations are made, and the lawyer is condemned to five years' prison. The respectable man of business takes his place on the bench of honor, and the lawyer's case in first publication of the letters has yet to be discovered.

A CHILD FRIGHTENED TO DEATH BY A MINISTER.

The London Times, of Sept. 20th, reports the following painful case, which has excited much feeling in that city, and caught consequent on beholding a minister: "Last evening, Mr. Edward Mitchell, Coroner for Middlesex, held an inquiry, at the Wellington Tavern, Cannon street road, Stepney, on the body of a child which died under circumstances of a very painful nature. Mrs. Emma Young, 129 St. George's street, Ratcliff, said that the deceased was her child, and deceased was my daughter. On Friday last, at twelve o'clock, I left the deceased with her mother, and returned to her about half-past one. I was accompanied by my nurse, Mrs. Richmond, and a girl named Ann Jones. I found deceased sitting by our side, in perfect health. We arrived rather late, and the minister had got into the reading desk at the time of my arrival. When he came out the deceased was terrified at his appearance, and screamed out, 'Oh, mother, look at the minister!' Mrs. Richmond had to carry her out to the churchyard, and when she returned to me I saw that she had blood in the face, and foaming at the mouth. She could not speak, and died in my arms. Dr. Hardy, the medical man was prescribed for. She was taken home, and put into bed, and I sent for Dr. Hardy. Death took place during the night. The post-mortem examination showed that the deceased died from the effects of fright, a portion of the brain were full of blood. The body was well nourished. He should say, from the history of the case, that the child died from fright. The jury returned a verdict, 'That the deceased child died from the mortal effects of a shock from fright, at the appearance of a minister in a surplice, while churching her mother.'"

An elderly gentleman, traveling in a stage coach, was amused by the constant fire of words kept up between two editors. One of them, at last, kindly inquired if their conversation did not make his head ache, when the gentleman, with a great deal of naivete,

"No, ma'am, I have been married 25 years!"

FEARFUL COLLISION OF CARS

In the Heart of the City.

A TERRIBLE and novel accident occurred on the 4th of December, at the junction of 3d and 4th Avenues and 5th street, by the collision of an iron-clad car with one of the city cars of the 3d Avenue road, to the total destruction of the latter, and the killing and wounding of many persons.

It appears that the express car, driven by Charles H. Hankins, left the depot, in Centre street, at the regular time, to connect with the train, at the station, at East 42d street, where steam is put on. After wheeling into the Bowery, from Grand street, the driver laid on his way until he came to the series of crossings, or "forks," of the road, which occur nearly opposite 5th street, in the Bowery, at which point the 3d Avenue city cars, running down, cross the Harlem railroad track.

Here the freight express car met car No. 53 of the city line, driven by Michael Horan, running on its down-ward trip, towards the Astor House, at about seven and a half o'clock. They met near, or at, the very point of the crossing of the roads, the city car endeavoring to get across the line of the 4th avenue track, and the express car endeavoring to get the track, so as to run up the 4th avenue.

Here the two came together with a fearful crash, the large iron car absolutely crushing the other into such fragments as to be utterly part all idea of repair, throwing the passengers in every direction about the street, running over the wreck, and carrying its course many yards beyond.

A scene of the greatest alarm and excitement immediately ensued; the shrieks, and cries, and moans which issued from the small car, and soon afterwards from the pavement, at once attracting the many persons who are always to be found in the Bowery, particularly between 8th and 9th streets, at that hour of the evening. One passenger in the city car, who was instantly killed, was soon afterwards taken away, and a have been injured in a very serious manner.

It was pretty generally conceded that both the car drivers were intoxicated, and that nothing but the most gross carelessness could have caused such a disaster. The most extraordinary part of the matter is how any one of the passengers escaped death or severe injury, when the total wreck of the city car was taken into consideration. One poor girl had in her hand, at the time of the collision, her pocket-book, with considerable money in it, which was not only lost, but her clothes were absolutely left in tatters. The neighbors showed their hospitality by extending all possible aid to the sufferers, while the dead was being dragged from under the wheels and debris.

No collision has ever occurred, in the annals of railroading, in which a car was so completely and thoroughly smashed up as in this one. How more lives were not lost, or how even one passenger escaped without fatal injury, is certainly miraculous. The passengers were scattered in the street in all directions by the force of the collision.

The crowd was very much excited, and expressed angry feelings in an uncompromising manner. There have been several persons run over from time to time at the crossings of the tracks at this point, and this is the second collision which has taken place here, a fact that can be readily accounted for, if the public will look upon our illustration of three weeks since upon this subject.

AN EAST INDIAN SEXTON.

"RATHER a strange fancy of yours, to live upon such amicable terms with the great enemy of the human race."

"Well, perhaps it is. But he once bit and killed a thief who came here to rob a child's grave of the iron railings, which its parents, contrary to my advice, had placed round it, and ever since then I have liked the snake, and have never thought of molesting him. I have had many an opportunity of killing him (if I had wished to do it) when I have caught him asleep on the tombstones, in the vigilant sun. I could kill him this very day—this very hour—if I liked, for I know where he is at this very moment; he is in a hole, close to the Ochterlony monument there, in that corner of the yard. But why should I hurt him? He has never offered to do me any harm; and when I sing, as I sometimes do, when I am alone here, at work on some tomb or other, he will crawl up, and listen for two or three hours together. One morning, while he was listening, he came in for a good meal, which lasted him some days."

"How was that?" [redacted]

"I will tell you, sir. A minar was chased by a small hawk, and, in despair, came and perched itself on the top of a most lofty tomb, at which I was at work. The hawk, with his eyes fixed intently on his prey, did not, I fancy, see the snake lying motionless in the grass; or, if he did see him, thought him something else—my crowbar, perhaps. After a little while the hawk pounced down, and was just about to give the minar a blow and a grip, when the snake suddenly lifted his head, raised his hood, and hissed. The hawk gave a shriek, fluttered, flapped his wings with all his might, and tried very hard to fly away. But it would not do. Strong as the eye of the hawk was, the eye of the snake was stronger. The hawk, for a time seemed suspended in the air; but, at last, he was obliged to come down, and sit opposite to the old gentleman (the snake), who commenced, with his forked tongue, and keeping his eyes upon him all the while, to slime his victim all over. This occupied him for at least forty minutes, and by the time the process was over, the hawk was perfectly motionless. I don't think he was dead; but he was very soon, however, for the old gentleman put him into a cell or two, and cracked up every bone in the hawk's body. He then gave him another sliming, made a big mouth, distended his neck till it was as big round as the thickest part of my arm, and down went the hawk like a shin of beef into a beggarman's bag."

"And what became of the minar?"

"He was off like a shot, sir, the moment his enemy was in trouble, and no blame to him. What a funny thing nature is altogether, eh? I very often think of that scene when I am at work here."

"But this place must be infested with snakes?"

"I have never seen but that one, sir, and I have been here for a long time. Would you like to see the old gentleman, sir? As the sun is up, and the morning rather warm, perhaps he will come out, if I pretend to be at work, and give him a ditty. If he does not, we will look in upon him."

"Come along," said I.

I accompanied the old man to a tomb, close to the monument, beneath which the snake was said to have taken up his abode. I did not go very near to the spot, but stood upon a tomb, with a thick stick in my hand quite prepared to slay the monster, if he approached me; for, from my childhood, I have always had an instinctive horror of reptiles of every species, caste, and character.

The old man began to hammer away with his mallet and chisel, and to sing a very quaint old song, which I had never heard before, and have never heard since. But this ditty did not bring out the snake. I remarked this to the old man, who replied:

"He hasn't made his toilet yet—hasn't rubbed his scales up, sir; but he'll be here presently. You will see. Keep your eye on that hole, sir. I am now going to give him a livelier tune, which is a great favorite of his."

And forthwith he struck up an old song, beginning:

"'Twas in the merry month of May,
When bees from flower to flower did hum."

Out came the snake before the song was half over. Before it was concluded, he had crawled slowly, and (if I dare use such a word) rather majestically, to within a few paces of the spot where the old man was standing.

"Good morning to you, sir!" said the old man to the snake. "I am happy to see you in your new suit of clothes. I have picked up your old suit, and I have got it in my pocket, and a very nice pair of slippers my old wife will make out of it. The last pair that she made out of your rejected apparel were given, as a present, to Colonel Cureton, who, like myself, very much resembled the great General Blücher in personal appearance. Who will get the pair of which I have now the makings, heaven only knows. Perhaps old Brigader White, who has also a Blücher cut about him. What song would you like next? Kathleen Mavourneen? Yes, I know that is a pet song of yours; and you shall have it."

The old man sang the melody with a tenderness and feeling which quite charmed me as well as the snake, who coiled himself up, and remained perfectly still. Little reason as I had to doubt the truth of any of the old man's statements, I certainly should have been sceptical as to the story of the snake, if I had not witnessed the scene I have attempted to describe.

"Well, sir," said the old man, coming up to me, after he had made a salaam to the snake and left him, "it is almost breakfast-time, and I will, with your permission, bid you good morning."

MEYERBEER'S OPERA OF L'AFRICAINE.

FOR years the music-loving people of the world have been agitated with the hope of seeing this opera, and at last have been gratified, as far as New York is concerned, by its production at the Academy of Music in the most elegant style.

The works of Meyerbeer have always been celebrated for their polish, and yet through this polish and care, the beauty of idea shines pre-eminent.

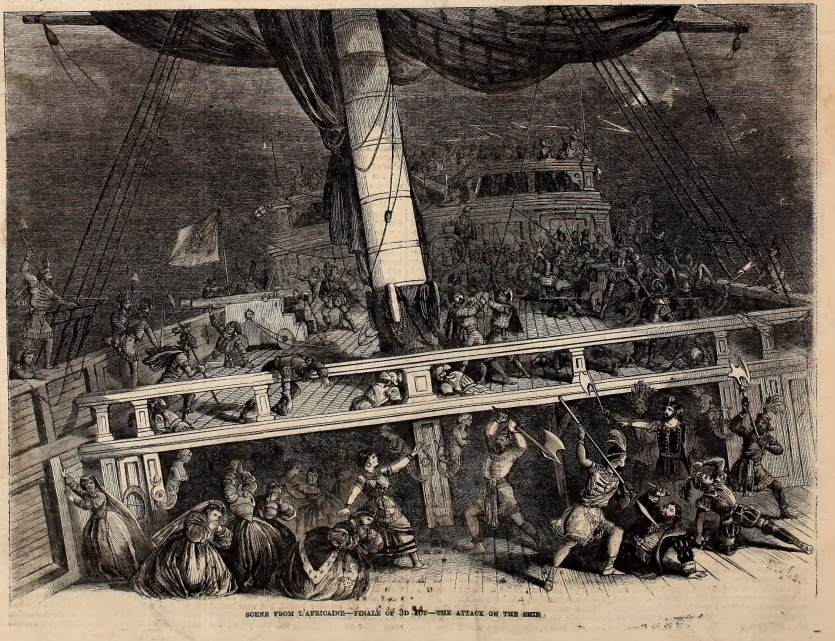
JOHN T. HOFFMANN, THE MAYOR ELECT OF NEW YORK.

The story of the opera, when viewed as a probability, is a failure, but when looked upon as an operatic necessity, is just the thing.

The first act introduces us to Inez, the betrothed of Vasco di Gama, the mariner. Of course the match is opposed, and Inez is compelled to marry Don Pedro after being assured that Vasco had perished at sea. Contrary to expectations, however, Vasco turns up, and appears before the Royal Council of Portugal, and proposes to add vast unknown lands to the territory of that realm, if ships and means are given to prosecute another voyage. To prove that such lands do exist, he produces two Indians whom he purchased in the slave market, whose complexion and language differ from those of all known nations. The Council reject his proposals, and discredit all his assertions. Vasco is indignant, rates the Council soundly for their ignorance and bigotry, and is consequently thrown into prison together with his slaves.

The second act discovers Vasco in prison, his slave Selika watching. That he has rescued her from harsh slavery, and been kind to her, is sufficient to engender in her heart a passionate love, of which he knows nothing. The other slave, Nelusko, loves her secretly, while he honors her as his queen in her own land. Jealous of Vasco, he endeavors to kill him, but is prevented by the watchful Selika. In the meantime, Don Pedro has got possession of all Vasco's plans and charts, through Nelusko, and has procured himself to be proclaimed governor of all the undiscovered countries, and also ships and men to enable him to look for the land which he goes out to govern. Urged by Inez, he procures the release of Vasco, tells him what he has done, and after purchasing Selika and Nelusko, leaves him, to embark with his wife, on a voyage of doubtful issue.

The third act discovers the whole party on shipboard. It seems to be a happy family until Vasco di Gama appears on the deck (he having procured a ship, in which he followed the course of his beloved Inez), and informs Don Pedro that a storm is coming on, that the ship is close to a dangerous coast, hard to weather in a storm, and infested by predatory Indians. Before Don Pedro, in a flush of gratitude, can imprison Vasco below, the storm comes on, the ship is struck by lightning, and the crew are severely struck by the Indians, who swarm over the deck and take the whole party prisoners.



The fourth act presents Selika as Queen, the ship having foundered fortunately on her own shores. Don Pedro and all his sailors, having been dispatched and probably eaten, the ladies are reserved for the delicate attention of the sacrifice. Vasco being a sea-dog, of course is saved, and wandering along forlorn and wretched, naturally sings, which betrays him to the savages, who, singing themselves, are not at all moved by his vocal display, and are on the point of clubbing him, when Selika rushes in and arrests their savage intent. Of course the Grand Priest of Brahmah is immediately called in to investigate the matter. Selika boldly avows that Vasco di Gama saved her from slavery, and married her in a Christian country, consequently that he is her husband, to prove which delicate fabrication she calls Nelusko as witness. The gentle savage swallows his disgust, determined to sacrifice himself for the woman he loves, and takes his oath that Selika's story is strictly correct. This being perfectly satisfactory, the lovers are left to their raptures. Vasco being accustomed to box the compass and look out for a change of wind, discovers that he positively adores Selika, and has just clasped her to his beating heart, when, in the grove near by, he hears the voice of his beloved Inez chanting her death song. What he felt being too great for expression, the curtain is considerately dropped.

The fifth act reveals the misery and the magnanimity of the Queen Selika. Being satisfied that her love is unrequited, she sets the lovers free, and as they sail from the principal port of entry of her kingdom she seeks the unfrequented shadow of the Upas tree, and dies a martyr to her generosity and love.

We have already spoken of the elegance of its production, and it is only necessary to add that the splendid scenic effects are followed by most accurate and showy costumes, and that each member of the company did their best, feeling a professional pride in the great work they had been called on to execute.

Carozzi Zucchi, Mazzolini and Bellini, sustain the brunt of the labor, and do it with force and feeling, while Mr. Carl Bergmann, with an orchestra that cannot be surpassed in the world, comes in for a large share of the honors.

It is unnecessary to say, under the circumstances, that the houses have been filled to repletion, and that the opera is the musical sensation of the season.

SCENE FROM L'AFRICAINE—FINALE OF 3D ACT—THE ATTACK ON THE SHIP.

PASSING AWAY

BY N. G. SHEPHERD.

THE leaves have lost their summer gloss,
And now are faded, dry and sere;
A brooding sense of nameless loss
Weighs on my heart while musing here.
Here, where my steps were wont to roam:
The woodland paths at close of day,
While now the sun's last lingering glance
Is passing from the fickle away.

Alas! the winds are growing cold,
That once were soft, and sweet, and bland;
The lavish Autumn's faded gold
Is scattered wide across the land.
Ah, me! the wind's complaining voice,
The barren fields, the leaf's decay,
Remind me that the waning year
Is passing from the earth away.

The old man sighs, "Alas! alas!"
His bitter days are full of pain;
The summer months, how swift they pass!
When will the warm sun shine again?
He shuts the aged eyes, and dreams
Himself once more a child at play.
He wakes again, and sighs "Alas!
My life is passing swift away."

"Ah, me!" she sighs, who smooths a braid
Of auburn, or of chestnut hair;
"So long a time, and still a maid,
Who once was thought so wondrous fair."
Again she turns, and in the glass,
Sets right the shining braid satisy;
"Ah, me!" she sighs, "my precious youth
Is passing from my life away!"

"Too late!" grieves one, whose cherished schemes
Were like the web the spider weaves;
"Too late, alas! my golden dreams
Have faded like the autumn's leaves!"
The primrose of the latter year
He finds unlike to that of May,
And sighs, "Alas! my castles all,
Are crumbling, one by one, away!"

Oh, Time! that dries our bitter tears,
And heals with joy our grief and pain,
Deal gently with our future years,
And lend us blessings in thy train!
So, while I shape this earnest prayer,
And close with it a worthless lay,
I find, even while I wove these rhymes,
One silent hour has passed away.

The Missing Diamond.

BY E. L. GORDON.

It was three o'clock in the afternoon when I returned from the lecture-room, and seated myself before the glowing anthracite, which my kind landlady had prepared for me. Everything, without and within, seemed to wear a new aspect—all was cheerfulness.

True, I had, that afternoon, received the degree of M. D., but then it was only awarded after nearly four years of patient and unremitting study. I did not feel that my fortune was made; yet, there was that satisfaction, that serenity of mind which follows the completion of a laborious undertaking.

Four years before I had, in one short month, seen the grave close over my earthly parents. I had no cousin, or uncle, or aunt to advise but one uncle and his family, consisting of a wife and a daughter, and they lived far down in the sunny South. I looked to no one for sympathy.

When my father was stricken down, a letter was dispatched to my uncle, his brother. He arrived just in time to see the last sigh, which my mother owe to fellow mortals, performed. Just in time to see his only brother buried. He remained but a short time, but in that short time my affairs were arranged, and I was placed under the tutorship of that good man, Dr. Vail. The professor of medicine was mine from choice; and my kind-hearted uncle heartily approved of it.

After settling the estate left me by my parents, it was found that there would be sufficient to enable me to complete my studies, and have something remaining, provided that I practiced a little economy. And my uncle, with a "God bless and prosper you," left me, in a new sphere truly, to return to the bosom of his family.

The remainder of those days came flitting across my memory like "shadows over streams," but my mind was in no mood for sorrowing.

The question where shall I locate? had been asked a number of times, but as yet remained unanswered.

I was abating in my mind whether it would be better to settle down in one of the older towns of the east, and patiently wait for practice, or go to some one of the western ones, there to grow in practice as population increased, and eventually, when riper years were mine, to be satisfied with the honor of being identified, from the beginning, with the flourishing city of ——vell, no difference about the name, when a gentle tap at the door aroused me.

"A letter," said a domestic, as I opened the door.

Why it was, I cannot tell, but it seemed to me, at that moment, that the question of my locating was settled. The letter was from my uncle, Judge Raymond. It was simply a written request to induce me to emigrate to the flourishing town of G——, in Texas. His reasons for advising such a move met my approval, and an hour later I had made the resolve that influenced, in no small degree, my after life.

Six weeks later and I, with several others, was traveling, by stage, from M—— to G——. It was nearly sundown when I caught the first glimpse of my destination. It was, indeed, a pretty village, and my hopes seemed about to be realized. As we entered the town, I could see that there was an unusual excitement.

No attention was paid to the entrance of the stage, or, at least, not so much as would be in one of our New England towns. The people all seemed hurrying towards the public square; men, women, and children.

"You may put me down at Judge Raymond's," said I, to the driver, as the rest of the passengers alighted at the Star; at the same time, handing him the extra fare, always expected by that class, for conferring favors, no difference how small.

A few minutes afterwards he drew up the horses in front of an aristocratic-looking dwelling, surrounded by a profusion of flowers, plants, shrubs and trees.

"This is the place," said the driver, and I alighted.

There were a number of ladies standing on the verandah, and among them I at once recognized the well-known countenance of my aunt. She advanced to meet me in true Southern style; but that pale-faced woman, who could it be Ella Raymond? How changed. She was white as marble. Her eyes sunken, and melancholy. My aunt received me kindly, saying that she was glad that I had arrived at that opportune time. But her remarks were cut short by the wild exclamations of Ella, who, by this time, had me by the hand.

"You won't believe him guilty. You will try to save him, will you not, Charles; yes, I know you will."

I caught her in my arms, for I perceived that she was about to faint. There was no time to make inquiries, and, with the assistance of my mother, I got her into the house. The ladies, on the verandah, had passed to the other side of the house, and did not come in until after I had gained the apparently lifeless form upon the sofa. Some simple restoratives were given, and, in a few moments, I had the satisfaction of seeing her returning to consciousness.

The visitors withdrew, and left me alone with my aunt and cousin. The latter was the first mention of Ella's independence. A few words sufficed to explain. A murder had been committed, and the affianced husband, Stewart Mill, charged with it. Mill, had been arrested on charge of committing the same. My aunt added that she, Ella, was so infatuated, so blind in her love, as to remain in the harbor, for a single moment, the thought that he was guilty. I thought she spoke in a manner that showed a want of faith in the fair sex of the fair girl, and was about to ask some further questions, when my uncle came in, which put a stop to the conversation, for the time being, upon that subject. Ella had returned to consciousness, and the first few moments of Judge Raymond's time were divided between welcoming me and caressing his daughter.

My aunt arose to leave the room.

"I must go," she said, "and beg pardon of my visitors for not introducing you. And I suppose the exigencies of the occasion will be sufficient excuse for the apparent neglect."

I made no reply, as she continued:

"Charles, as Ella seems to be over the attack, had you not better arrange your toilet, and go with me into the dining-room, as there is, no doubt, curiosity to see the stranger."

I know not the reason, but I felt like answering her in a manner that would not well accord with the rules of etiquette.

"No, aunt, Ella still needs attention, and I am too much fatigued to think of anything else than being an ordeal," said I, in a tone none the sweetest.

This settled the matter, and she left the room.

A few moments elapsed, when she returned with the gratifying intelligence that her visitors were gone,—principally because I was interested in the fair patient before me.

It was not long afterwards that my uncle led the way to the room that was to be mine, and at the door of which was no sooner closed than I threw myself upon a lounge, and began to puzzle my brain about what was best to be done. I had learned enough from the almost incoherent expressions of Ella, when returning to consciousness, to satisfy me that there was some mystery connected with the murder. Her firm belief that her lover was innocent, was no proof; yet, I thought that in spite of that, he might be guilty. The servant summoned me to supper, I had fully determined to know all.

I met my uncle and aunt in the hall, from whence we immediately proceeded to the dining-room. As yet they had learned but few of the particulars of the tragedy, and seemed quite willing, any motive to induce one in Stewart Mill's position, to commit such a crime. That my aunt believed him guilty I could see, but she seemed too shrewd to commit herself, and after discussing the simple viands spread before us, he proceeded that we should go out on the piazza.

"Perhaps," said he, "the excitement has abated, so that we can learn something a little more satisfactory."

But in this he was mistaken, as we found that the crowd collected in the square were becoming more boisterous, and clamorous for the blood of the prisoner. Each person to whom we directed any inquiries was sure to tell a different story from the others.

My uncle introduced me to a few of the leading citizens, but the excitement was so high, that I do not believe I would have been remembered by them in fifteen minutes afterwards, as the sequel will show. I had no difficulty in undoing what was done in that brief period that we remained among that incensed mob.

At last, tired out, and vexed at our ill success, we wended our way homeward. The inquest was to be held as soon as the necessary witnesses arrived, but no one seemed to know when that would be; an hour; in the morning; to-morrow; it was all surmising, nothing positive.

When we returned, Ella was sitting in a large arm-chair, her head resting upon her hand, and her pale face speaking more plainly than could words, the intense mental agony which she was suffering. I drew a chair close to hers, and in a professional way, asked whether she was better. She did not answer, but turned as that her melancholy eyes rested upon me. I broke the silence again by saying:

"Ella, cousin, can you not confide in me? Are you afraid to trust me, either to administer medicine or advice?"

"Charles, I am not sick. Oh! that he was in no more danger than I am."

"I beg of you to calm yourself. All hope is not gone. He is not dead, neither has he been convicted of the crime. Tell me all; if there are tangible reasons for believing him not guilty, I will not rest until he is released."

I felt that something must be done, or a spirit would soon be released from its frail tenement, or a mind wrecked on the shores of insanity. At length she said:

"I know he is not guilty." And then she paused. I waited some time, but she did not seem inclined to proceed. Again I said:

"Can you not confide in me? Am I——"

"Yes, yes, I will tell you all—everything—don't say that I cannot confide you—I can, I will!"

"We, that is, Stewart Mill and I, were to be married in one month. He is the son of a wealthy planter, and resides some twelve miles from here. I have been acquainted with him for three years, or ever since he returned from college; my heart has been his since that time, and I know him to be the embodiment of honor; he would die rather than commit a mean act. He was here this morning, and with him, Mr. Gilpryer, and was happy in my consent to accompany him, was returning to make the necessary preparations for the marriage, when, as I approached, I saw the people hurrying too and fro, and ran to the gate to learn the cause of the intense excitement. Jules Pierre was stretched out at that moment. He had a gun on his shoulder, a brace of birds in his hand. His face was pale and haggard.

"I have since heard of the murder, Miss Raymond?" he said.

"Murder!" and a cold shudder ran through my frame. "Who?" I gasped, rather than articulated.

"John Rhodes, the mail-carrier, was shot about half an hour before Stewart Mill, who, after killing him, attempted to rob the mail."

I heard no more; and when, after an hour, I again returned to consciousness, I found myself lying on the sofa, attended by my parents and the family physician.

Jules Pierre was gone, but I distinctly recalled the shade of fiendish delight that played over his countenance, as he uttered the words that pierced my heart like pointed steel. He is a rejected suitor, and one so far forgot himself as to swear that he would have revenge. It may be wrong, heaven forgive me if I am, but I believe Jules Pierre to be the murderer, and, through John Rhodes, Stewart Mill the victim.

"Who is Jules Pierre," I asked, as she ceased speaking.

"A young South Carolinian, who has been here about three months."

"What his business? What occupation does he follow?"

"None; he represents himself as being the son of a wealthy planter."

"From what direction was he approaching when you first saw him?"

"By the east road."

"The murder was committed on the north?"

"Yes."

These questions were asked, because I considered Jules Pierre, to say the least, a very indiscreet person, and felt that every word might be of advantage.

"You said that Jules Pierre was a rejected suitor, and that he once made threats in your presence. Have you, dear, do you remember?"

"About one month ago."

"Were you engaged to Stewart Mill at that time?"

"We have been engaged for more than two years."

Notwithstanding my previous intention of not being present at the inquest, this conversation with Ella changed it, and I determined to go.

Ella begged me, with tears in her eyes, to accompany me, which he readily consented to do, after inquiring after the condition of his daughter, and being assured that there was now no danger of a relapse, unless over-excited upon the subject which absorbed her whole being.

Mr. Mill, the father of Stewart, brought us to the house in which the body of the murdered man had been deposited. But in that short time I decided upon what was now no danger of a relapse, unless over-excited upon the subject which absorbed her whole being.

Mr. Mill, the father of Stewart, brought us to the house in which the body of the murdered man had been deposited. But in that short time I decided upon what was now no danger of a relapse, unless over-excited upon the subject which absorbed her whole being.

He spoke kindly to me when I went on to explain my reasons for so doing, he readily consented. I furthermore requested him to introduce me to Jules Pierre, to which request he consented itself. I had a desire to form his acquaintance. The inquest was very tedious. The facts elicited were as follows:

Three men—respectable citizens of the village—were going on horseback to M——. At a short distance from town they heard the report of a gun, revolver, or pistol, but thought nothing of it, until they had rode some two hundred rods, when they saw Rhodes lying in the road, and the green bank by the roadside, and saw a man disappearing over the hill beyond—Stewart Mill was that man. The testimony of these three, a revolver was produced, which had been picked up, not more than three rods from where the deed was committed. Several persons testified to its being the property of the afore named. The ball extracted from the body was smaller than those used in the revolver, while a careful examination showed that not only were all the barrels of the revolver loaded, but were loaded with the ammunition. These facts produced some difference of opinion, but very popular was against the prisoner, and a verdict was brought in that the deceased came to his death through the agency of Stewart Mill. I know not how others felt, but I can state that there was one that did not believe him guilty.

I retired that night, revolving the foregoing facts in my mind, until near daylight, when I fell into a troubled, dreamy sleep.

On awakening the next morning, I determined to see the prisoner, and hear his version of the affair. Through the influence of my uncle, it was no difficult task to gain admittance, and I entered the cell of the accused alone. I shall never forget that moment. Seated on a rude bench, with face pale and haggard, sat as noble a specimen of the genus homo, as I ever looked upon, and when his eyes met mine, I felt I would have sworn that the thought of murder had never entered his mind. He arose and advanced towards me. I was completely nonplused, and scarcely knew what to say; but at length told him, in answer to his question, why I was there, that I was on an errand of mercy, and although a stranger, considered, I was his friend. He grasped my hand; his whole frame shook, and he simply said:

"It is useless, the case is too clear, everything is against me."

"You do not mean to say that you are guilty?"

"No; but circumstances are against me. I have studied the matter carefully, and, notwithstanding that I am as innocent as you, I believe there is no hope."

"If a stranger, yet a messenger from one that loves you dearer than her own life, should tell you Ella for an hour, would you believe me? would you take courage, and give a true account of the whole affair, as far as you were connected with it?"

"Ella Raymond, do you know her?"

"Yes; and had it not been for her, I would not now be here."

"Does she think that I am guilty?"

And I fancied that he has brightened in anticipation of a favorable answer.

"She believes you innocent, and nothing but the assertion to the contrary from your own lips, can ever make her believe otherwise."

"God be praised! I had determined to make no defence, as life would only be a burden, had she thought me guilty. I will tell you all."

And in a firmer voice, he told the following:

"I had been up to Judge Raymond's to engage Ella for an excursion to Millgrove. She had consented to go, and I was on my way home to complete my arrangements, when, as I was passing through the woods in Green Hollow, I saw a horse running, which I at once recognized as John Rhodes'. In two minutes after, I saw a sight which caused me to recoil. It was the body of John Rhodes struggling in the last convulsions of death. I dismounted, and raised him up. It was then that I found that he had been shot. I did not hear the report of the gun. Probably I was too much absorbed in my own happiness. As soon as I fully comprehended the situation, I glanced around; the mail bag was not there. My other faculties were disturbed, I know not. As I mounted my horse to go for assistance, I fancied, perhaps, that I saw a man ride behind a large cotton-wood tree, that stands about two hundred yards from where the deed was committed. I rushed, but could see no answer; and on my return to my horse, was soon at the nearest dwelling. My hands were covered with blood, and by some mishap—at least I was since prepared—I lost my revolver. To my utter dismay, there was no one at the dwelling, not even a servant could be seen. A white lady at the window was acting as sentinel, and I proceeded to wash the blood from my hands, preparatory to returning to the village, when the three citizens, whose testimony led to the conviction of the murder, met me, and charged me with being the murderer. My confusion, with the blood on my hands and clothes, seemed to strengthen their conclusion. 'You may consider yourself under arrest, Mr. Mill,' said one, 'and it will be our painful duty to guard you here, until proper officers can be sent for.' I expostulated, it was of no avail, and you, no doubt, know the rest from the testimony given last night. I have no fear, I feel that I am undone; yet it would not be so hard to die, if my friends, my parents, and above all, Ella Raymond, would not suffer by the foul blot, which I feel will for ever be a stigma of disgrace upon them."

"Do you know Jules Pierre?" I asked, after he had finished.

"The young South Carolinian. Yes, but why do you ask?"

I did not appear to hear his question.

"Did you see him on the morning of the murder?"

"Yes."

"Where?"

"He was going out on the north road as I came into town. I spoke to him about the excursion, and asked him if he was going. He answered in the affirmative, and our interview or conversation I rode on. He had Judge Raymond's rifle."

I asked no other questions, but telling him to keep in good cheer, that I would see if something could not be done; I signified my desire to leave the jailer, who had stood on the door. I determined on the course that I would pursue. Going directly to Judge Raymond's I found that he was gone, and was told that Jules Pierre the morning before. No inquiries for a reason were made, but I could see that he thought that I was strangely changed. Another gun, then the balls, and finally, the patching, the judge all the time eyeing me intently.

"Uncle, you know what my motives are," I said, as I handed him back the gun, and started to the coroner's. I had been introduced to him on the previous evening. He met me with a pleasant smile, and asked me in. I informed him that I had a curiosity to see the ball which had been extracted from the body of John Rhodes, and had called on him for that purpose, if it was still in his possession. He replied by furnishing it. I compared it with one that I had brought along. They were alike, the same size, and apparently from the same mold. I felt that I had struck the right track, which, by vigilantly following, would, no doubt, lead to the release of the innocent, and bring the guilty party to the punishment which he justly deserved.

When I returned I expressed a desire to visit the place where the murder was committed. My uncle, knowing the motives in view, offered no objections, but willingly agreed to accompany me. Two spirited horses soon carried us to the spot. I examined it minutely, but failed to discover anything that would fix suspicion on any one save Stewart Mill. At length, being somewhat fatigued and thirsty, I went down to a little brook which crossed the road some rods below.

Not finding a suitable place to quench my thirst, I wandered on up the little stream to where the water gurgled over the moss-covered rocks, and fell—a miniature cascade—below. Just as I was stooping down to drink, something very bright lying in the edge of the water caught my eye. It was a diamond pin, such as is frequently worn by gentleman. "Is this another step towards solving the mystery?" was the first thought that entered my mind. I proceeded to examine the place minutely. Footprints, small and but ill-defined, were found close to the edge of the brook. Shreds of moss, on the bank at the foot of a large cotton-wood tree, had been pulled up and scattered around, and on a root which was partially out of the ground, I discovered dark spots, which, upon close examination, proved to be blood. Further examination showed that some one had been there the day before. "Could this be the tree that Stewart Mill fancied that he saw a man dodge behind?" Some shreds of tow, with peculiar marks in the moss which I soon discovered, showed to my mind but too plainly that not only had the gun been loaded there, that sent the fatal bullet on its errand of death, but that previous to it the precaution had been taken "to wipe" it out. I felt satisfied in my own mind of Stewart Mill's innocence, and of the guilt of Jules Pierre, but as yet I had no tangible evidence to offer in the court-room.

When I returned to where I left my uncle, I found him slightly ruffled at my long absence, but a few words served to dispel the cloud, and we mounted our horses and turned their heads homeward.

As we rode along, conversing upon different topics, for the first time the thought of when the trial would come off entered my mind. I waited until our conversation began to break down into simple remarks before I asked the question. To my surprise I found that court convened on Monday—this was Friday—and that Stewart Mill would be tried before Judge Raymond, my uncle. I, at first, on hearing this, began to feel that I would have to tell him of my hopes, my fears, and the reasons for them, but when I had taken a second thought I determined to keep my own counsel.

"Has he—Stewart Mill—secured any counsel as yet?"

"Ellis Harrington has volunteered to defend him, but with all his sagacity and acuteness I cannot see how he, for one moment, expects to hold out against the overwhelming evidence that will be brought to bear against the unfortunate man."

"Well, I shall assist him; perhaps both of us can roll back the tide of evidence which threatens to engulf an innocent man."

The judge looked at me in surprise, and then broke into a satirical laugh.

"You assist him! You, who have never read five consecutive pages of Blackstone, and know nothing of our criminal code, setting yourself up as counsel in a case like this! Are you going crazy?"

"Going crazy, or not going crazy, I intend offering my services," said I, a little piqued at the manner in which he had spoken.

"Well, well, if your services are accepted, do what you can."

"I will clear Stewart Mill."

"Doubtful, very doubtful."

We were now in the suburbs of the village, and the conversation ceased.

As I walked into the parlor that evening with the intention of relieving, as far as possible, the mind of Ella by telling her my hopes, and what I had discovered, I found myself face to face with Jules Pierre. The introduction was formal, but my eye took in the whole man at a glance. Shortly afterwards Ella left the room, and our conversation became less reserved. He appeared to be well stocked with sympathy, both for my fair cousin and Stewart Mill; said he had been hunting the day before; had not seen Stewart Mill for some days; had never been in Green Hollow; thought that he would go out the next day; invited me to accompany him; I found him much inclined to boast; he talked of his plantation in South Carolina, of his servants, of his influential friends; I remarked that life certainly had many charms for one so favored.

"Yes," he replied, "I cannot deny it. I received a few days ago a talisman of love from those I left behind, but, unfortunately, it has either been purloined or I have lost it."

"Indeed! was it valuable?" I was afraid to say more.

"Worth about five thousand; a gentleman's pin; a diamond of the first water."

I controlled my feelings the best I could, as I said:

"You have been unfortunate, truly; and then to think that it was a gift."

"That is it; I would not let it bother me an hour had I purchased it."

"You may recover it yet," I said, not knowing what else to say.

"I hope so."

And, to my great relief, he changed the conversation. A half an hour after he took his leave, but not until I had promised to accompany him, on the morrow, to Green Hollow.

The day of the trial soon arrived, but I was ready. The Court House was crowded to overflowing, all seemed anxious to catch a glimpse of the prisoner; and, when he was brought in, I could see that there were but few, if any, persons besides myself that believed him innocent. He was pale, but his bearing was firm. At the usual question, "Guilty, or not guilty?" he arose and fixing his piercing black eyes upon Judge Raymond, he spoke, in tones so solemn, that even the Judge seemed moved:

"Not guilty, so help me God!" and he resumed his seat.

His eye wandered over the court-room. Nearly every face there was familiar, but I knew that he felt that there was, for him, a lack of sympathy. The jury being impanneled, some minor questions of law discussed, the examination of witnesses commenced. I sat by the side of Ellis Harrington. We had determined on our "line of defence."

When the witnesses were "handed over," Harrington did not ask a single question, but simply dismissed them. Curiosity was at its highest pitch; and when court adjourned in the evening, without a question being asked by the counsel for the defence, various were the surmises of all. No one was more puzzled than Judge Raymond. He thought we had decided to throw the prisoner upon the mercy of the court, without bringing any more evidence against him than we could avoid. Even the accused, although assured by me that all would be well, seemed to loose all hope, and to feel, as it were, that he was a condemned man.

The next morning the trial proceeded in the same manner. Harrington was a little pale, a little nervous, but he still maintained his silence. Only two more witnesses remained to be examined. The counsel for the prosecution was completely baffled, and he determined to "tack about."

"May it please your honor," said he, addressing the judge, "the evidence is overwhelming, and the defence, by silence, acknowledge it. It is useless to examine witnesses any further; we are only wasting time. I am willing to submit the case."

"Call the next witness," roared Harrington; "I am not done with this case yet."

The next witness was called, and disposed off in the same summary manner as those that preceded him. There was but one more; he was called. It was Jules Pierre. He took his seat on the witness-stand with perfect nonchalance. The prosecuting attorney asked a few questions, which, to him, were satisfactorily answered.

"You can go, Mr. Pierre."

"Hold! I have a few questions to ask of this witness," said Harrington.

I thought the cheek of Pierre blanched a little. I was certain that the muscles of his mouth twitched a little as he said to Harrington:

"Proceed."

The interest now manifested was intense, even breathing seemed, in a manner, suppressed, so profound was the silence.

"Is this your place of residence, Mr. Pierre?"

"No, sir."

"What is your business or occupation?"

"I am a gentleman."

"Were you acquainted with the deceased, John Rhodes?"

"I was."

"Are you acquainted with the prisoner, Stewart Mill?"

"I am."

"When did you see him last?"

"Before the murder?"

"Yes."

"Three days before, if I am not mistaken."

Harrington now arose, and, fixing his flashing eye upon the witness, said:

"Jules Pierre, I wish you to state to the court who it was that, on the morning of the murder, borrowed, from Judge Raymond, a gun; then proceeded to leave town by the north road; met Stewart Mill, the accused, and conversed with him about the excursion to Mill Grove; hunted in Green Hollow, killed one brace of birds, then again approached the road from the west; wiped and loaded the gun under a large cotton-wood tree; descended from there to the brook below, to get a drink, there lost the diamond pin, which I now show you; and then, with fiendish intent, the intent being double, first, to have revenge for an imaginary wrong, secondly, to replenish pockets not overstocked with money, shot John Rhodes, and deliberately proceeded to rob the United States mail?"

During these questions the witness sat as if transfixed, his face alternately livid and pale. As they were concluded, he shook like an aspen leaf. At last he gasped, rather than said:

"It is a lie! Who said I killed John Rhodes?"

"Judge Raymond, I demand that this man, the murderer, the self-convicted murderer, be arrested," roared Harrington, in tones that carried conviction to every mind.

But Jules Pierre was not to be taken without a struggle. He quickly drew a knife, and delivered such well-directed blows, that he well nigh escaped.

At length he was overpowered, and conveyed to the cell so lately occupied by Stewart Mill; but not until he had wounded several persons, some severely. The most intense excitement prevailed, both judge and jury left their places; it was evident that something must be speedily done, or the life of Jules Pierre would pay the forfeit. Some one suggested that he be made to confess. Immediately the cry of "Confession or death without mercy!" "Confession or death without mercy!" arose from nearly all. Jules Pierre heard it, and, to gain the respite of a few short hours, made a full confession, which accorded, in every particular, with the facts set forth by Harrington.

During this part of the scene, I had almost forgotten Stewart Mill. I found, on returning to the court-room, that he had fainted, when his innocence was no longer doubted by any one. Kneeling beside him, with tears streaming down her cheeks, was the now happy Ella Raymond. A little farther back, the father of Stewart Mill was supporting in his arms the partner of his life. Standing at the table, with lips compressed, and bright tears glistening in his eyes, was Judge Raymond. It was a scene for the pencil, not for the pen.

That night Judge Raymond threw open the doors of his mansion. All were invited to attend and partake of the festivities of the occasion. It is almost needless to say who were "the lions of the evening," as Judge Raymond was not long in informing all, that Stewart Mill owed his life to the untiring efforts of myself and Harrington. When all others stood ready to convict him, we alone were laboring to show his innocence. We were complimented, flattered, and praised enough "to turn a landsman dizzy;" but there was no escape, we could only submit to it patiently. At ten o'clock, the leading minister of the village entered the room; behind him came the light, airy form of Ella Raymond, leaning on the arm of Stewart Mill, and then came Judge Raymond and aunt, and Mr. and Mrs. Mill. We all knew what it meant, and ranged ourselves around the room. A chapter was read from the old family Bible, a few remarks made, a few words said, and Stewart Mill and Ella Raymond were pronounced one.

The company was about leaving, when the sheriff came in and stated that Jules Pierre had committed suicide. He had cut his throat with a small knife, whose place of concealment had escaped detection, when he was searched by the officers before being left alone. Nothing of his previous history was ever learned, and, after some months, the court turned over to the family of the murdered man the money and other valuables which had belonged to him; among them was the Diamond Pin.

A Monomaniac:

An Hospital Sketch.

"Doctor, dere's a man in number seven, and she's werry bad, sa'," was the hurried salutation of the queer old porter, as, having wakened me one night from a sound slumber, he stood bowing, in the most apologetic manner, at the threshold of the door. "Werry bad, sa!" he reiterated, opening the dark lantern to its full extent, and allowing the light to stream into the chamber. It was his usual manner, and he had no occasion to ask "Will you come?" for his announcement, and even his coming at all, at such an hour, guaranteed a visit to the wards.

In a few minutes we were threading our way to number seven.

Arrived there, we found a man, rolling about the floor, in apparent agony, filling the air with his lamentable groans.

His fists were doubled and jammed against the pit of his stomach, while the contortions of his face, when it was possible to catch a glimpse of it, amid his writhings, was extremely suggestive of cholera morbus. Such, however, proved not to be his ailment. His groans subsided somewhat as we entered; and, in broken sentences, he stated that a bug, that he had carried about in his stomach for years, had broken loose, and was then running back and forth inside, and occasionally trying to get out!

As it is usually necessary, in an hospital of this kind, to judge of a complaint entirely apart from a patient's statement, his absurd story was barely noticed, but the appropriate treatment was directed, and we left him.

At breakfast, the next morning, upon speaking of the circumstance, the physician in charge of his ward gave the following account of his previous experience with the man:

"He was brought here, about three months ago, as a confirmed epileptic; and, by the story of the persons who came with him, was subject to frequent and terrible attacks.

"Rather at variance with this, however, after we admitted him, he had scarcely one convulsion during the month, and that a mere trifle. One night, though, he came to me, in a most confidential manner, and said he would tell me the cause of all his trouble, promising two hundred dollars, that his uncle was to bring from California, for a cure.

"He then gave quite a connected statement about sleeping in a corn-field, and having a queer kind of insect creep into his mouth, and awaking just a second too late to catch him. This extremely confidential story, I afterwards ascertained, had been made to every person in the building with whom he had come in contact.

"Of course, everybody consulted had prescribed a remedy; and, as the presence of the insect was merely an indication of mental disease, he had followed every direction most implicitly. It was amusing to hear his description of the various courses of treatment through which he had passed, and equally so to see with what confidence he had turned from one to another, failing in all. In less than a week after admission he had become the victim of a thousand jokes. He became known as 'Two Hundred Dollar Johnny,' always the same, quick to work, perfectly rational in all other respects, but subject, at intervals, to the queerest sensations, or actual pain, from his supposed tormentor. His worst trouble would always be when the bug, as he asserted, would take a journey up to his head, or down to his feet!

"Whether he ever really had the pains he complained of was a mystery, for no medicines, however powerful, seemed to have the least effect: while the fact that, at times, the most inert substance, if given with mysterious directions and strict injunctions to caution, would wonderfully relieve him, showed pretty clearly the nature of his affection. To show how easily he could be imposed upon: he one day presented himself, with a raging toothache, begging to have the offending member drawn. After the operation, it was ascertained that some mischievous person had told him, that if he should have a certain tooth pulled, there would then be a hole for the bug to creep out, giving him, at the same time, some article to hold in his mouth, as an inducement. Absurd as such advice may appear, he had shown his faith so far as to resort to the necessary strategy, and endure the pain of the operation, and was found, an hour afterwards, lying on his back, holding the prescribed article in his mouth. So thoroughly was he affected by his peculiar mania, that the most ridiculous advice, even from those whom he surely must have known would impose upon him, was followed to the letter.

"At one time, for nearly a week, he inquired of every one he met for pigeon's eggs, but it was for a long time impossible to find any reason for his new whim. At last one of the female nurses, whose good looks carried with them a deal of persuasion, succeeded in gaining his confidence. The head cook, who had been long bothered by him for raw meat, prescribed by some other disinterested confrere, told him that as a great favor he would give him a receipt received from a celebrated physician, or some mythical wiseacre, that was a sure cure.

"He must get a pigeon's egg, with but two or three specks on it, and swallow it without breaking the shell. He was then to lie down in the sun for a whole day, when the pigeon would be hatched and pick up the bug.

"To give this sage advice proper force, he exacted of Johnny a written promise to pay the two hundred dollars immediately upon the arrival of the expected uncle.

"This idea seemed, more than any of its numberless predecessors, just the thing to Johnny, and it was long ere he could give up so plausible a theory for the removal of his enemy.

"He was shut up in the smoke house, and sent off in various directions for impossible nostrums. He was drugged and showered, and, indeed, 'treated' almost to death by his numerous advisers. How it would have ended no one can tell, had he not attempted to prescribe for himself, and selected the remedy most agreeable to his palate, namely, gin.

"This being an article furnished, of course, exclusively for the sick, was constantly under lock, and the hiding place of the key known to none of the patients, save Johnny himself, whose duty it was to carry the various kinds of stimulus from cellar to ward.

"Up to the date in question no suspicion of his proclivities existed, but on this occasion a sudden demand for brandy having arisen, the steward was hastily dispatched to the cellar. Missing the key from its accustomed place, he proceeded directly to the vault, and there lay the hero of the bug in a drunken slumber, coiled up on the damp floor, holding in endearing embrace a demijohn of gin.

"This little mishap, while it failed to dispose of the insect, was the means of deposing its possessor from his agreeable berth of butler, and returning him to his position in the ward. For a few weeks all went on smoothly, and Johnny had almost been overlooked amid the mass of patients, when complaint was made by the chief apothecary, that alcohol had been repeatedly stolen from the little outbuilding in which it was usually kept, and that water must have been substituted in pretty large quantities, for, suspicion of some such adultèration having been aroused, the barrels most exposed were several times tasted, and suspicions converted into certainties. This complaint at once directed observation to several wards in which drunkenness seemed to be unaccountably increasing, and, for several nights, a special watch was stationed, without, however, any success in detecting the purloiner. At last, one moonlight night, the sleepy watchman discovered an individual issue stealthily from behind the outbuilding with a jug in hand. In the shadow of a contiguous fence he crept along, tipsily balancing himself with one hand, and swinging the jug from side to side with the other.

"The outbuilding stood a few rods from the main house, in the yard belonging to the females of the hospital, but close to a high fence separating it from that of the males.

"A second fence crossed this at right angles, about fifty yards from the back of the outbuilding, forming a boundary line to the enclosures.

"The stealthily creeping figure having arrived nearly to the dark angle of the fences prepared to climb over. Aided by a pile of rubbish that had long been accumulating at the spot, he had barely reached the top of the fence, when the watchman, who had hastened from his lookout, sprang towards him.

"With one terrified glance at his detective the man slid from his perch, but whether owing to the contents of his stomach or the heavy jug, he lost his balance and fell upon the end of an old gate that had long stood wide open in disuse against the fence.

"Rather unfortunately an iron strapping had warped unnoticed in the sun, and still more unfortunately caught through the waistband of his trowsers, leaving him suspended in mid air.

"In this interesting predicament, the watchman found him struggling violently to break loose, but still clinging to the cause of all his mishaps—the jug.

"Little mercy could be expected from a man who had been on the lookout for two-thirds of the night, and consequently Johnny, for it proved to be he, was allowed to hang in his comfortable position till the watch should be relieved, when he was removed and confined in the cells. That was about the end of my experience with him, for until very lately he has been employed about the building at hard work, and your call to see him is the first in several months.

"Sometimes it seems almost impossible to believe him other than a maligner, while occasionally his eccentricities are so extreme as to mark him a fit candidate for a lunatic asylum.

"Shortly after the morning of the above narration Johnny was removed to the asylum at ——."

THANKSGIVING DAY—HANGING UP THE MUSKET.

THANKSGIVING DAY—THE CHURCH PORCH.

FOUR BOONS.

Four friends around a hearth were clustered,
One blustering night, in cold December,
When Father Winter well had mustered
His troop of chills from Nova Zembla.
And while the wind, around the dwelling,
Howled like some fiend let loose from task,
As they were tired of story-telling,
Each one agreed a boon to ask.

And so they stirred the fire a blazing,
And pushed the glass to one another,
And all erect, each glass upraising,
They drank the toast, "Each man a brother,"
And then they settled the rotation—
From east to west, was thought most fitting,
And after many strong potation,
The Man of Pleasure spoke while sitting:
"Give me wealth of time and treasure,
Full each hour with love and pleasure,
Let this world's sweets, unchained by measure,
Rate each day,
Wealth and wine, and love and leisure,
Let the next go as it may."

Again they pushed the glass around,
Which makes each heart grow bolder,
And after care was three times drowned,
Up rose, and spoke the soldier:
"Let me feel the breath of battle,
While my hand holds sword or shield,
Ill fed joys where cannons rattle,
On the serious battle-field.
Give me deeds of martial glory,
On the land, or on the main;
Let me live in song and story,
While earth holds a battle plain."

Now bitterer blew the wintry blast,
To drown its din, the wine was passed,
And when its strength was somewhat broke,
They listened, and the Artist spoke:
"Give me the power divine to trace
The perfect form, the angel face,
The great ideal of my soul,
With perfect truth; then let Time roll.
On earth no more reward I'll ask,
That I find within my task.
Long let it live when I am gone,
Reward of life and monument of stone."

Now came the last of all the crowd,
The host in wealth, and yet most proud,
The one whose life had erred most ill,
Whom Fate loved best to kick down hill,
Who spoke of joys, yet knew them not,
Whose love or glory lay in thought,
Whose stablest comforts were like smoke,
In short, the Poet 'twas who spoke:
"Let me but hear my own voice ring
Like some proud warrior's song;
Let my song, the worse grief lighten,
Make sweet hours go sweeter by,
Love of truth and honor heighten,
If thou wilt, then let me die."

Each boon was asked, and round the board
They circled now, and good wine poured.
The Man of Pleasure led the rest—
"Toast thus the boon we think the best,
Fill high again! Fill care and sorrow,
We live to-day—we die to-morrow.
Time will not stop, if we would borrow
His sands of wealth,
Still pledge me in this generous Douro—
The Poet's health."

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GUY WATERMAN'S MARE," "REUBEN'S WAY," ETC.

CHAPTER XLIV.—AN ENTIRE TURN OF THE WHEEL.

SLEUTH'S cry for help was quickly answered. The door-bell, to him jubilee, was no sooner stepped between the two young men, and heedless the space immediately in front of the prostrate Sleuth, when the action of the law of an antique hero, ready to do battle with Anthony in the injured man's behalf. And thus guarding the oppressed, he said to Anthony:

"No violence—no violence, young man, if you please! What is that paper? I forbid you to destroy it! Stand back!"

"Yes!" cried Sleuth, who had by this time risen to his feet, both spiritually and corporeally. "Give it to the doctor; I trust all to him! Let him read it."

"Presently," said Anthony, in a harsh tone of voice, and with a strangely alarming air; and without another word, he began to examine the desk, and more especially the double bottoms. Not a sign was perceptible of any recent workmanship. The color of the wood presented no marked differences; and, most serious of all to Anthony's mind, appeared the fact that he had never noticed any special feature of the bottom of the drawer, other than now presented itself. It was true he could not recollect having ever turned up the drawer for any purpose, so as to know what appearance it really did present; but as he looked, and remembered the alarmingly secretive ways, he found it impossible to resist the conclusion that his uncle's own hand had placed the paper where it had now been discovered; and that if so, all his prosperity had been a cruel delusion—that he was a beggar, or, at best, a dependant on Sleuth's bounty.

Still, this was no child's play, and he was not going to assume facts that ought to be proved.

"Pardon me," he said to Clarissa, as he passed close to her to ring the bell. He stood, when he had done so, with the rope in his hand, looking with a sort of impassive face on the scene, till the servant came in.

"Tell Gibbs to get the carriage out, and go as fast as he possibly can to Mr. Stamp, and give him from me an urgent message that I want him here with Dr. and Miss Pompeus, and must rely on his coming back with Gibbs. Tell Gibbs to hasten as if it were a matter of life and death!"

The servant went out, and Anthony, as he dropped the bell-rope from his fingers with a dead thud of the metal knob against the wall, seemed, to Clarissa's fancy, to be moving his lips, as if he were saying, in connection with his last remark, "God knows it is life and death to me." Then recollecting the doctor's demand, he walked across the room to him, bowed, and said, with a melancholy smile:

"If—if that which has happened just now is what it seems, I will not be murder at all my forgetfulness. Be so good as to take the paper which Mr. Sleuth"—every one noticed the change, both of style and tone, that accompanied the utterance of this name; and it was the more marked, for he repeated the words—"which Mr. Sleuth so pathetically, and with so little confidence in me, asked to have placed in your hands. I too, Dr. Pompeus, place the fullest reliance on your justice and impartial dealing. There is the paper."

The doctor took it, put on his gold spectacles, and when he had done so, gave just one look over them at Anthony's face, of a less angry kind than he had yet shown since his own quarrel with him, and then he read aloud the following document:

"ROCK HOUSE, March 23, 1816.

"This is to signify that in consequence of the ungrateful behavior of my nephew, Anthony Meadowsweet, and for many years past, of all the love and care of a parent, I hereby revoke, so far as he is concerned, the will made in his favor, and bearing date April 1, 1811; and I now say that all the rights thereby conferred on him I now transfer to my sister-in-law, Richard Sleuth, whom I have this day taken to my home, and who will, I have every reason to hope, be as a child to me in my old age."

The reader was interrupted. Sleuth burst out into a paroxysm of grief and sobbing, and ended by saying:

"I would—oh! I would! Dear, good old gentleman, how I should have loved him! and I know he—" His strength there, apparently removing admissions he had made as to the aldermen's sentiments after their mutual experiences of each other, to be added—"but he didn't understand me—no, not even to the last."

The doctor went on:

"I am sorry, and I hate the whole tribe. If what I have said isn't sufficiently clear, let me repeat, I leave all I possess to Richard Sleuth. I hope that's plain.

"SILAS MAUDE.

"Witnesses, } Ann Milton.
} Phillis Conyngham."

There was a deep silence for perhaps a minute after the reading of this by the doctor, in a subdued voice, turned to the housekeeper and said:

"Did you, Mrs. Milton—you and your goddaughter—witness this document, the first day Mr. Sleuth came?"

"Don't know, I'm sure, sir, what it was; but the alderman called us up, and said, putting his poor shaking finger on some writing, 'This is my last will and testament,' or something of that sort, I mind it well, for he laughed afterwards, and said he wasn't sure he hadn't been telling a lie—that perhaps he ought to have called it a codicil; but it didn't matter."

"And you did sign, then?"

"Yes, sir."

"Hem!" said the doctor, softly, and turned away in a kind of respect and sympathy to Anthony in his great misfortune.

* * * * *

"Mr. Sleuth," said Anthony, after a long and most painful pause, "you will forgive my asking you—what, at the moment, you can hardly be sorry to have asked—one question——"

Sleuth looked; and, while he seemingly waited for Anthony to frame his rare and unexpected questions that Anthony might put, in order to judge whether or no he should refuse to say anything till the doctor and Mr. Stamp had understood him to wait for the question, so proceeded.

"I do not put the question offensively; I only put it that Dr. Pompeus, in the character of an unprejudiced arbitrator, may understand you, Mr. Sleuth, to be able to state that you knew nothing of——"

"No, Anthony, I don't say so. I did always hope and believe that the alderman had done what it now seems he did; but I feared, after my uncle's death, he must have altered his mind, and destroyed whatever paper he had got ready."

"I understand; and you did not see. What I meant to say was, you have known nothing about this since the time Mr. Stamp produced the will in my favor——"

"Oh, dear, no! nothing till now," said Sleuth, with extreme eagerness of assertion.

"And, of course, the most resentful suspicion of the paper being in my desk, where it was now found?"

"Oh, dear, no! How could I? Why, Anthony, I must be a fool to stay as I was, if——"

"You are quite right. Thank you," said Anthony, and relapsed into silence.

* * * * *

It was a trying time for all parties, that interval between the discovery of the concealed paper and the coming of the lawyer. Clarissa would have given worlds—so she felt—to have been able to comfort Anthony in his sorrow; to do it, if this fearful calamity were really about to crush all his earthly prospects? The doctor felt very much the same, in spite of his still deep and smouldering resentment, and he walked about the place with a strangely silent step; and when he spoke, he did his best to subdue the resonance of his voice, and bring it into harmony with the melancholy atmosphere of the place and time. As to Sleuth, he kept apart from every one, seeming not to see no one, but casting furtive glances, from time to time, to see what Anthony was doing—where standing or sitting—how looking. He was so absorbed in this and allied thoughts, that he forgot even to stare at Clarissa, whose beauty, for once, seemed to fail to achieve its ordinary effect —that of shedding a light in the place where she happened to be, and drawing all eyes to the source.

While Mr. Stamp was still waited for, there occurred before the mourning window a man, who, though there was nothing remarkable in his appearance, which was that of a broken-down professional person, was destined so that it is no exaggeration to say could hardly have been exceeded if the spectre of the murdered alderman had been stalking before all these people, and demanded vengeance on the murderer. His face darkened suddenly, and then became unearthly in its hue of terror. Before him, in the person of a man was Bob the Ostler, the living evidence to Sleuth's lie, but now so solemnly uttered, and the unanswerable demonstration (if once known in his true character) of some profound motive in Sleuth's mind for so apparently unnecessary a fraud.

"The idiot! what brings him now? He will ruin me, even at the moment of triumphant success!" Sleuth said to himself, while his limbs seemed to be undergoing paralysis, and his very cunning seemed about to desert him, just when he had nothing else to trust to.

The first thought was to get out and speak to Bob; but then he could not conceal from himself the tremendous change in Anthony, who had instantly become, by way of it—from boundless faith to boundless suspicion. For Anthony to get hold of Bob just now might be not only ruin of prospects, but of life, and worldly estate. So flagrant an act of deception, first about the concealment, and then about the discovery of the supposed codicil, would appear to all minds that the paper itself must be false, no matter how well authenticated it might appear to be.

"What is it, sir?" said the doctor, when Bob had slunk away, after seeing so many persons in the room.

No one answered. And Sleuth thought every one must be expecting he would answer, and so at last he said:

"I suppose, I dare say. They do get so impudent now-a-days. I'll go and see."

He went out, expecting every instant either to be followed by Anthony, or to hear his voice requesting him to stay where he was. But his vivid fears misled him. He was able to go alone into the little garden, where he found Bob coolly lighting his pipe.

Transported alike with rage and fear, Sleuth dashed the pipe from Bob's mouth: then, seeing Bob was, in fact, half drunk, he held up his hand to check him from crying out, and said, in a smothered tone:

"Are you out of your senses, Bob, to come here just now?"

"All right, Minther Sleuth! Where's my pipe? I valley that pipe, though I am worth ten thousand pounds. Won't you ax me in? I say, couldn't you spare a thousand pounds now? We know a thing or two together—don't we? Eh, minther Sleuth ?"

"Curse it! What do you want?"

"Lord love you! only to get a sight of your bonny face, and ax you when the great diskivery's to come off. Is it ten thousand pund?"

"Quick! away with you back to London. It is discovered, and nothing can prevent me from being able to prove you were in Gloucestershire in a few days except the sight of your own ugly mug here just now. Let the people in there once know how I am being served, and they'll set the constables after you, and go to law with me, and fight me to the last, and I haven't a penny to maintain such a fight. I can see what you are doing. I wonder at you, Bob. It's absolutely idiotic."

"All right, Minster Sleuth! But I'd like to hear the upshot of this 'ere meetin'. I'll sink away, unbeknown to anybody, and come agin at night. And if I don't stope me, there's a young 'oman here —and an old 'un, too—I have matters—as can speak to my character as a hexpert hostler."

"I can't spare another moment. If you will persist in remaining here, you must remain there so uselessly, meet me at dark two fields beyond the well. No a word more, except to pretend, as we pass the house, that I've been trying to sell me something. Go first, as if I was driving you out."

Bob drew out the only valuable he had about him—his own much-beloved and useful knife—and began, as they approached the conservatory door, to open and pass praises of his cutlery, of which that was a sample.

The persons within the room saw the man retreating before Sleuth, and they saw he had not the impudence to stop and stare in turn at every one present, before he went off, saying loudly:

"Then I quit open shop to-day? Can't give a poor, honest, hard-working man a chance of earning a bit of bread!"

Under the circumstances Sleuth would have smiled to see how successfully Bob carried off the idea of his vocation as a peddler; but he was too side at heart at the prospect of so great a task to do more than sigh with a sense of relief, as he returned to his place in the room, saying:

"Poor old Bob's a beggar. He came here begging earnestly after the presumed peddler, of whom he caught a new glimpse as he passed along outside the wall. But Bob was forgotten in the presence of a new comer—Mr. Stamp.

The first keen glance of that gentleman told him something extraordinary had occurred. A second glance—revealing the action of the doctor's hand, which, with a great care, drew from a breast pocket a small folded paper—made him say to himself, with instinctive sagacity:

"As I live, there was a codicil after all! Poor Anthony Maude!"

And so he found, when the doctor, with extreme deliberation, told what had occurred as to the fall of the desk, the discovery of the paper, and the corroboration given to it by Mrs. Milton's statement.

Mr. Stamp, after a good look at each of the persons present, and an extra look at Anthony when the latter observed, "It was I who sent for you," went apart a little and read the paper through. Then, with deliberation equal to that he did not need a second perusal of it, all-important as it was in its every word and phrase.

Next he looked at the paper by the light, and scrutinized it thoroughly that way. He next turned with his back to the light, and scrutinized the back of the paper with equal attention. It was strange how long he stood thus—strange, because nothing appeared to come of his study; and whatever fancies might have begun to be entertained in the spectators' minds, in explanation of this minute and prolonged survey, died out as they heard his first words.

"Who found this, may I ask?" said Mr. Stamp, and he looked at Sleuth, as if expecting there to get his answer; and he did get it, though it was not what he expected.

"Oh! not me. No, it was my cousin Anthony, as the doctor and everybody here can testify."

Mr. Stamp looked as if he did not like this answer. He paused, and fidgeted, and took snuff from his box; and, for once, threw the whole away, instead of duly dusting the mountain of dust the lingering particles that he was accustomed to shake off after the satisfaction of his nose. Sleuth and Anthony were also uncomfortable under the lawyer's sharp, inquisitive gaze.

"He doesn't mean—confound him!—to think I have had a hand in this, and have been foiled, by accident, to expose it at last!" thought Anthony.

He was too eager to suggest Anthony to him. He'll trap me, if I'm not more cautious," was Sleuth's secret comment.

Mr. Stamp would not receive at second hand the evidence of the housekeeper, but made her repeat all she had said.

"I suppose you have no means of being quite sure this is the very paper you signed?" he asked her.

"That's my writing, sir. I don't write so often that I can't tell my own composition when I meet with it again."

"Yes, no doubt. But apart from the writing, is there anything that would enable you to identify the actual piece of paper?"

She bent her head forward, as in a fog, and thought a little, and then shook her head decidedly and said:

"No, I don't tell you anything more about it. I was a bit nervous, you see. So that when I took up the paper with both hands to draw it a bit nearer to me, I was so very scared that I held it with one hand, and tore it with the other. Yes, I tore it; but I begged pardon, and the dear, good old gentleman, who was always so kind to me, said it didn't matter; for he had half a mind to go on with what I'd begun, and tear it all up."

"Was the paper in the right position for you to sign, when you took hold of it, and tore it."

"Yes; only I wanted to draw it a bit nearer the edge of the table."

"And do you happen to recollect whether it was on the right side or left side, or where, that you tore it?"

"Yes; I tore it with my left fingers, almost close to the corner."

"The left corner?"

"Yes!"

"Thank you, Mrs. Milton. For a lady who promised so little, you exhibit a wonderful performance." So Mr. Stamp, raising his nose just a little, but with a glance of deep interest towards Anthony, who had been following this dialogue as in a dream, and knowing exactly what it meant, but believing Mr. Stamp, as a friend, was doing his best for him. "Here is the exact defect in the paper that the exact piece described; and it is, as we may all see, just such a defect as would be made by the process so lucidly explained by our worthy friend the doctor. Now, Anthony, while the other was trying to raise it by the edge. I have myself more than once torn a leaf of a book in the same way my more impetuous friend did."

Anthony heard, and felt that there was fate in every word.

"Mr. Stamp," he said, "I am in your and the doctor's hands. Whatever you see to be clearly right, that do, and I will abide by the consequences, whatever they may be."

"Am I now to speak as a sort of general friend of the family, or as the special adviser of Mr. Anthony Meadowsweet?"

"I—I am quite willing to do as—as Anthony says—leave all to you, Mr. Stamp, and the doctor; I mean, as to discovering our individual rights," said Sleuth.

"I suppose," said Mr. Stamp, after a fresh pause, and in a brief phrase to Clarissa's anguished face, so full obviously of sympathy with Anthony's position, "I suppose there is no thought of a sort of friendly compromise meditated—say, a division of the estate?"

"Certainly not!" rang out, in almost defiant tones, Anthony's voice; and Sleuth thanked his stars that, therefore, he had no occasion to speak.

Exchanging looks of mutual understanding, the doctor and the lawyer withdrew into Anthony's study.

"Well, doctor, this is a startling piece of business!"

"Very. Have you any doubt that the paper is what it appears to be?"

"Not the remotest. Remember, that when we met after the alderman's death, it was quite a moot thing with these young men which was to succeed; and it is but the fact that Mr. Anthony had been sent for at the last moment, I should say no one would have doubted but that Mr. Sleuth was the heir. I, who had the original will in my pocket, felt sure that Mr. Sleuth would come out upon us with full powers. The codicil was not then forthcoming, so Anthony took possession. Now it has turned up, and—said as it is to my so—I fear the supposed heir must turn out."

"Dear me! dear me! Very strange. I may say —in spite of the young man's behavior to me very sad!"

"But can't we do something for him before it is too late? I can see it in the looks of Mr. Anthony, that there is danger in him—danger, I mean, of that kind of explosion of his feelings which may at once turn the two into bitter enemies."

"Have you anything to propose?" asked the doctor.

"Well, yes. I have but now prepared for Mr. Maude a deed, by which he gives to his cousin this house and everything in it, and the land round it—which, I should say, nigh ten thousand pounds—"

"Is that possible?"

"It is exactly true. Mr. Sleuth has the deed. Now it is quite impossible that he should do less than transfer that deed to Anthony, with a mere transposition of names. Our young friend would then, at all events, have a career before him, and may do even better without the bulk of the alderman's wealth than with it."

"An admirable idea! Quite an admirable idea!"

"I am delighted you think so. Shall I call up Mr. Sleuth, and sound him?"

"Pray do."

Mr. Stamp went softly back to the door of the room, unnoticed by Anthony, caught Sleuth's everwatchful eye, beckoned to him, and the two immediately came to the doctor.

Sleuth was charmed at the idea. In fact, he didn't mind telling them that for the last ten minutes he had been able to think of nothing else. But he was cunning enough to put a weighty question.

"Of course I'm to enter at once on my rights?"

"That I cannot at this moment answer," said Mr. Stamp, gravely.

"Then, my dear sir, hadn't we better postpone all arrangements whatever till—till it is decided?"

"That is but just," said the doctor aside to the lawyer.

"And makes the whole concession just worth nothing at all," whispered the lawyer back. "No, we can't leave it in both ways. If I had the slightest hope of proving the codicil invalid, I don't mind owning to you, in spite of the worthy gentleman over yonder on this door, that I should have particular pleasure in doing it."

"I suppose, then, it had better be as you say. If Mr. Sleuth will engage—"

"I'll make him sign, for temporary purposes, the existing deed, altering the names, and putting our initials, to show the corrections are legitimate."

"That's right—yes, yes."

"And then if he does so, Anthony must acknowledge the paper in our presence, and all the rest can be arranged easily by you and I, doctor."

"Will you, then, go to Anthony, while I prepare Mr. Sleuth?"

The doctor took Sleuth's arm, and began. The lawyer went back to the room, and said:

"Would you, Mr. Maude, walk apart with me for a minute or two?"

"Certainly."

"My dear young friend," began the lawyer, as they walked to and fro on the grass of the strip of lawn, just out of sight of the persons they had left, "this a sad business for you—so utterly unexpected! Though, to tell you the truth, when I before threw you the business of this kind, I did believe that Mr. Sleuth was the fortunate man, and it was a great surprise to me when he produced no will or codicil."

"Yes, I thought very much the same myself."

"I think I can understand how it has happened that your interference has been aggravated by having all given to you, only for it to be again taken away. Your uncle wrote the paper we have discovered in the height of his irritation against you, and when it was most natural that he should do so—that is, when bringing your cousin to take your place. I never saw a man who was so inconsistent as the alderman. He would do the most impulsive things, and then manage to undo all by some extraordinary piece of caution. Having duly provided for your cousin, he remembered he had him on trial, so he put the paper away, where nobody could find it but himself, till he had made up his mind."

"And you suppose he did finally decide to leave me penniless?"

"I am bound now to think so. He may have had intentions even on his death-bed, but we can't build on them, my dear Mr. Maude."

"And is there, then, no hope for me?" asked Anthony.

"That is a question to be answered in two ways," said the lawyer. "There may be two suits; and, as you are in possession, and the other party is not, it is just possible he might be kept off, or driven to propose a compromise: not as a matter of feeling or sentiment—I quite understand you to object to any solution of that kind—but as a mere question of expediency on both sides."

"If at is the answer one way—a way, I fear, not likely to suit me," said Anthony. "What is the other?"

"Simply that you accept the truth, that you have no case."

"And that is the truth?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Then there's an end. Let's go back."

And Anthony, with a shy but resolved step, turned.

"Stay, Mr. Maude; no hurry. Remember, what we do now in the way of yielding cannot possibly be undone afterwards."

"Of course not. Let us go in."

"No hurry, I repeat. My advice is, take time. Let me take your affairs in hand, and let your cousin consult somebody else. I admit then be charged with courting the rising sun, as all events."

"No; you are very kind, and if I saw one single honorable or wise reason for delay, I would stop. I feel only too much inclined to fight, I am sorry to say. But I must have a cause, and I thought it just possible you might do me one."

"So I can, if you won't be too fastidious as to its quality."

"Thank you, thank you. I understand, and I know very well you don't really want me to do any thing dishonorable."

"Certainly not!" interrupted the lawyer. "I want you only to take things coolly, and look about you, and make the best of things."

By and by, Anthony, still treating all this as mine, you mean, now that you are quite satisfied it is not mine?"

"I have no more to say, Mr. Maude. Let us go in. Stay; if I understand you rightly, you propose to do an honorable thing in the most straightforward fashion. In brief, you are prepared to acknowledge the paper?"

"I am."

"Very well. You are not, I suppose, like the whining gentleman I once heard in a play, 'in love and pleased with ruin?'"

"I'm not."

"Just what I am going to do. You have another duty to perform to Mr. Sleuth. Can you not guess it?"

Anthony looked as though he could guess, but that his explanation was not likely to be agreeable, so was silent.

"That deed of gift to your cousin. He is anxious to transfer that to you; not as an absurd piece of generosity, but as a matter of simple justice."

"I won't have it!"

"Yes, you will!"

"Will I?"

"You will. Now be patient. You will, because, if you do not, you will dishonor both myself and Dr. Stamp, and place us in the wrong. I am to be sort of our judgments, and who think you are bound to accept that which Mr. Sleuth was bound to offer."

"You don't know how hard this is to me!" said Anthony, earnestly.

"I think I do. It is the part of wise men to bear the inevitable. I cannot think of advising you to own that paper, unless you accede to this arrangement. But, once that is done, independence, to the you really want to cut each other's throats after all is thus settled, I really see no sort of objection. I mean—"

Anthony's laugh showed the lawyer he had succeeded.

Half an hour later, Sleuth set his signature on the altered deed of gift, and Anthony formally acknowledged the validity of the newly discovered paper.

Till then, Mr. Stamp had carefully concealed a little fact that he had taken note of in that prolonged examination of the back of the codicil. Now, however, he thought he might as well, before giving up the paper, show it to Anthony.

Again they paced together the daisy-covered strip of lawn, and the lawyer could help casting one glance at what they had done.

"Dreadful as the blow is to you, you are, after all, so artificially reared, that it will not kill you, as he who has a soul above luxury. Ten thousand pounds! Why, you're a kind of Croesus yet. I don't know whether the name will convey any sequence, but will you look at the back of this paper?"

Mr. Stamp held the all-important codicil with instinctive professional caution in his own hands, till, on reflecting what he was doing, he smiled, and said:

"Don't suppose I fear to trust the paper in your hands. Take it, and look."

Anthony did take it, and did look, with eyes that almost blazed with the sudden and fierce light that came into them.

"Villany! villany! I swear it!"

"Hush! hush!" urged the lawyer. "What does it mean?"

"It is a pencil memorandum," said Anthony, almost trembling with his emotion, "that could only have been placed here after my arrival, and when the alderman's dead."

"Indeed, that is truly serious! Why, do you say so?"

Anthony's only answer was to run back into the room where the others were still waiting; but he took no notice of them. He went straight to the desk, and brought back a letter. With that he stalked out into the open air, and waving aside all before them all.

"Tell me, if you please," he said, hurriedly, to the lawyer, "what you read there in those pencil marks?"

"Sloman, £793.8.10, June 17," said the lawyer, reading out monotonously the words and figures from the back of the paper.

"Which corresponds, Anthony, "that I received from Mr. Slocum, a wine merchant at Oxford, the day before my uncle's death, a letter threatening me with proof, if his bill were not paid, was not paid on the 17th of June. There is the letter. Read for yourself."

Mr. Stamp read, and his face grew strangely clouded and anxious as he did so. It confirmed what Anthony said; and, of course, there could but be one of two conclusions—either that some one (and all the facts pointed to Sleuth), had surreptitiously read that letter, and for some secret reason had wished to bear the facts in mind, and so had noted them on the back, possibly, of the only paper available at the moment; or that Anthony himself had been the writer, and if so, had had possession of the codicil at the time of his uncle's death, had secreted it, being, perhaps, afraid of the terrible penalty that would await him, if convicted of its destruction, and was, therefore, even now, stooped to the very lips in fraud and dishonesty, by the attitude he held. No wonder Mr. Stamp's next head gave as little excitable, as he saw, distinctly, the two alternatives.

"Do you recognize anything special in the handwriting?" he asked Anthony, after a brief pause.

Anthony looked, and a visible pallor overspread his face as he did so. He saw that the implications of the spirit as to the appalling ordeal in front for him, or was it the intensity of his horror of the abysses of the future, at the edge of which he stood, and looked down into?

For a brief space the lawyer had wondered whether Anthony saw his own position as it was affected by this discovery. He was not long left in doubt.

"Well, Mr. Stamp, which of us is it?"

"You mean—"

"I mean that Anthony Maude, or his amiable friend and dear cousin, Dick Sleuth, is one of the greatest scoundrels in all creation. Am I the man?"

Anthony stood before the lawyer, his eye actually seeking and compelling the answering glance of the lawyer's eye, who looked at the stern, expressive face, and most loyal face, and he caught at Anthony's hand, and said:

"Then are not the man!"

"Come, then! We know who is!" And Anthony turned to go.

Mr. Maude"—and here the lawyer put his hand on the young man's wrist, and forcibly held him—"for heaven's sake! be cautious. This is ruin to character if—"

"If what?" demanded Anthony, furiously.

"If Sleuth is too much for you, and acquits himself at your expense."

"I care not!"

"You must care—you shall care! No, no, Mr. Maude, you would not so forget yourself, and so insult me, a friend, and the lawyer, as be noted as almost threatening gesture.

"What do you want?"

"Silence about this terrible discovery till I see what it means, and what had best be done about it."

"Mr. Stamp," said Anthony, in a tone of such sudden change, and so full of deep and terrible meaning, that the lawyer knew some serious thing was coming, "Mr. Stamp," he repeated, his two hands both clutching at the lawyer's hands, his face close to the lawyer's face, and his expanding eyes gazing into his own in a way with an almost supernatural sense of awe; "does nothing strike you—nothing horrible—nothing that one must reserve even to one's self?"

"I cannot divine your meaning."

"No?"

"I—I think not."

"Has I you understand?"

"I hope not."

"Then you do! Is it not awful—the combination of facts? He alone present—he alone, dreading my arrival—he alone preventing, perhaps, my withdrawal from destroying this paper, or writing another—"

"Mr. Maude, I refuse to listen to this. It is wrong—it is impious—it must not be uttered."

"You believe it yourself. It is in your face—your eye—your lip, which trembles as mine does."

"Anthony Maude, I pray, master yourself. You are being carried away by passion."

"Mr. Stamp, if Richard Sleuth knew of that codicil, he was guilty of the deed lying, and knew that it was not worth sixpence if my uncle lived—if he did that which I dare not put into words—"

"Wicked words, Anthony, I will say."

"Don't you then see how vital to him would be a temporary concealment of the codicil, so that every one should be content in their first thoughts of suspicion by the irresistible reply—he had no motive?"

"Maudman! Have you done? Are you silent at last? Now, then, hear me. I do not believe you are a guilty man, but I tell you frankly, that if the doctor suspects your uncle's death should arise, this paper, with these pencil marks on it, would do more to damage you than all the things you have alleged against Mr. Sleuth. Eye does rake rebel. It is you who convict yourself of being hardly pressed for money immediately before the alderman's death. It is you who, according to the cock-and-bull story of Mrs. Milton, was seen burrying to the safe, red-handed from the murder. Now, in all probability, the codicil was kept, if not in the desk, then in you have fallen into your hands; then it was you between the alderman and the consequences, and now it is seemingly in your handwriting this memorandum found upon it, when it is discovered, quite accidentally, and through no voluntary act of yours!"

The lawyer spoke warmly, though in a low tone; and Anthony stood in the picture in all its horrible proportions, and hues, and grouping—and grew, suddenly buried his face in his hands, and burst into the overpowering anguish and despair of his soul.

THE NUMBER FORTY.—Has the number forty any Cornelian significance? Certainly it makes it the number of expiation. It very often occurs as a penalty, and as a duration. Noah's rain forty days and forty nights at the deluge. The Israelites wandered forty years in the desert. Moses was in the mount forty days. Goliath defied the armies of Israel, it is said, for forty days. Our Lord was forty days in the desert, and as commemorative of this we have the forty days of Lent. After a Synod there are forty days' quarantine (passages of the civil law); forty days' residence for establishing a domicile, and an inhibition must be recorded within forty days. In the Canon law there was the forty days during which an excommunicated person might seek absolution. Although a measure of prominence is certainly given to the number forty in the Bible, we do not apprehend that it is there invested with any mystical meaning.

TIME AND MONEY, A DIRGE.—Money and time are the heaviest burdens of life, and the unhappiest of all mortals are those who have more of either than they know how to use.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

In one of our country inns lately, a man who was called upon to appear as a witness could not be found. On the Judge asking where he was, an elderly gentleman rose up, and with much emphasis, said:

"Your Honor, he's gone."

"Gone! gone!" said the judge, "where is he gone?"

"That I cannot inform you," replied the communicative gentleman, "but he is dead."

This is considered the best guarded answer on record.

An Irish Dragoon officer, on hearing that his widowed mother had married since his father's decease, exclaimed:

"Mother, I hope she wont have a son older than me; if she does, I shall lose the estate."

Concert Etiquette.—At a concert which took place lately, a gentleman in the audience rose up just as the first piece on the programme had been performed, and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, with your consent, and by your leave, I'll sing your vocalists a song to order, or to sing in return, as there is a conversation going on close by where I am sitting, that I intend to hush at once as to prevent any enjoyment of the music. I prefer certainly to hear the concert, but if I cannot be so gratified, I desire to hear the conversation."

This was as extraordinary a request and attentive audience in the hall during the rest of the evening.

Good Company.—Sir Sidney Smith's life was remarkably fond of sailing, and pursuing his favorite amusement on the Medway, with an old fisherman, the vessel admitted but a small quantity of water. At last the fisherman, tired of his old mate, and with great composure, asked him how much water that vessel would require before she would swim.

"Half a bucket full, my dear fellow, Sir George."

"Then," said the tars were unfurled, and they came safe on shore. The old man being relieved, he did not answer again till Sir George of his danger, replied:

"Why, my party, I'm an old man, and should not like to be in better company."

SPEAKING ENGLISH.—Two Dutchmen once got into a dispute about the English language, each one declaring that he could command the best. They made a bet at length, and appointed a time to decide the matter, and accordingly they began:

"Well, Claus," said the first, "did it rain to-morrow?"

"I do all but it wash," said John.

Wasn't that pretty good?

PRECOCITOS.—"Tilly," said a mother to her little boy, "you must send but five summons, "What should you do without your nurse?"

"I should put on every day just such a dress as I wanted," was the prompt reply.

"Is not Sidney Smith, "I say a good thing to-day, and forget it to-morrow in another company, the flash of to-day is as much the forgotten of to-morrow, as the light of our musk: is the flash of another. But let a humorist write his jokes in a book—let him preface them in any voice, manner, language, and gesture, which he can command, and they will represent it was before, and future a tinge of novelty into the reader, as though it were the first hand from the press, says an English writer, and his best anecdotes, when he can be certain they are read by them, had always a fresh zest. His play of mind was equally effective in the company of the wise and the unlearned, or humorous thought.

THE IRISHMAN.—Mr. O'Flaherty undertook to tell how many there were at the party. "The two Corrigans were one, mesself was two, Mike Shim was three, and—after the death of Mary—we had four; counting his fingers, the two Corgans was one, Mike Shim was two, mesself was three, and Mary's ghost was four of us, but Saint Patrick couldn't tell the name of the ghost." He missed him at last. He left Mary's ghost, the two Corgans was two, mesself was three—and—Mary was four. Saint Patrick was too much for him.

THE Raleigh Progress gives this dialogue:

Army Chaplain—"My young colored friend, can you read?"

Contraband—"Yes, sah."

Army Chaplain—"Glad to hear it. Shall I give you a portion?"

Contraband—"Sartin, massa, if you please."

Army Chaplain—"Very good; what paper would you choose?"

Contraband—"Well, massa, if you chews, I'd take a piece of terbacker."

The chaplain looked at the contraband, and the contraband at the chaplain; then the latter sighed and passed on.

A CHINESE DINNER.

A GRAND complimentary dinner was given to Hon. Schuyler Colfax and party, and a number of local celebrities, by the "Six Chinese Companies in Calefornia," on Thursday last. The feast began at 6 o'clock P. M., and lasted till twelve. It consisted of 366 dishes of meats, fishes, fowls, and was served in three distinct sittings. At the first sitting the courses consisted of soups and almost numberless "made dishes," into the composition of which entered pork, fish, fowl and vegetable substance, in a thousand forms undreamed of by our Occidental Caucasian housewives generally. The famous "bird's-nest soup" was there in a concocted delicious by all who partook of it, and a vast number of other soups of a character equally delicate. These included in these courses. As soon as one dish had been passed around and tasted by each guest, it was removed, and the next brought on in its stead. No knives, forks or spoons of our patterns were upon the table, but in their stead ivory chopsticks, with short thick china spoons or scoops, being what each guest was expected to help himself with. The efforts of the Celestial cook to master the culinary science of the country the food to their mouths with them created a vast amount of fun among the company. Fine wines were served in abundance with every course. Between the last sitting and the second to the reposing room to smoke and pass away the time till the tables were rebuilt. A Chinese band of music discoursed sweet lived and varied the entertainment.

The second sitting of the companies and the committee or merchants thanked Mr. Colfax and his companions, and Mr. Colfax thanked the Chinese company, which called forth a rainbow of speeches, and the feast was brought up with a general handshaking. The "outside barbarians" who were entertained considered the affair a great success.

THE SPARROW V. THE CATERPILLAR.—A circumstance has come to our notice which forcibly illustrates the wisdom and goodness of the Supervisory of creation, and the folly of seeking to exit-pate them. A gentleman in this county who has a choice variety of cockerbury bushes, apprehensive of the visits of the sparrow in search of the destroyer of the leaves to his fruit, took the trouble and expense of getting a net to cover the bushes, and secured part of the garden where his cherished plants were located. He was pleased to observe the sparrows busily engaging his fruits from the attacks of their Sparrow and his companions, but was doomed to disappointment. He had checkmated the little birds, but in doing so he had given a fair field for the ravages of the caterpillar, and at the maturing season he found, to his no small annoyance, that both leaf and fruit had disappeared. This little incident adds another proof to the many that the small birds are, after all, the best friends that the gardener has. They, no doubt, help themselves occasionally to a share of the fruit, but, as the most valuable equivalent, in helping to keep down the numbers of one of the most destructive pests the gardener has to contend against.

SENOR DON ALVARO COVARRUBIOS, SECRETARY OF STATE, CHILE.

ALEXANDER REYES, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, CHILE.

THE WAR BETWEEN CHILE AND SPAIN.

Sketches of Members of the Chilean Cabinet.

Among recent events on this continent, none have roused a deeper interest among the friends of Free Institutions than the audacious, insolent, and unwarranted attack of Spain on Chile—an attack made in furtherance of the same design which has carried France to Mexico, and which had previously led Spain to attempt the life of Santo Domingo. Inflated by her momentary success in Peru, Spain imagined she could also put Chile under contribution, and on pretexts as trivial as unreal, undertook to blockade the ports of Chile. The consequence was a prompt declaration of war on the part of that republic, and the Spanish Admiral now finds himself in the ridiculous position of undertaking to blockade upwards of 40 ports with seven old and lumbering ships. Of course commerce laughs at this parody on a blockade. It ought not to be, and will not be, respected. The Government of Chile is made up of firm and able men, whose portraits we publish this week, and who are noticed in detail below.

Senor Don Jose Perez,

President of Chile, was born in the city of Santiago, Capital of that Republic, in the year 1800, of a family which distinguished itself in the revolution of the Independence. His public career commenced in 1826, when he was sent as Secretary of the first Legation of Chile in the United States, where he was strengthened and confirmed in the republican ideas imbibed in his early youth, and which he has retained in all their freshness, in every position of his life. Subsequently, Señor Perez was sent as Chargé de Affaires of Chile in Paris, and later to the Argentine Republic. After retiring, for some time, from public life, he became successively Minister of the Treasury, of the Interior, and of Foreign Affairs, which latter position he held during the Presidency of Gen. Bulnes. All this long experience gave to Señor Perez an aptitude in business and a cognizance of affairs, which, joined to the highest ability and rectitude, pointed him out as the fittest man in Chile for the exalted position of President. His administration has been signalized by a remarkable subsidence of political passion, aroused by civil war, and by a steady consolidation of the country, and development of its resources. He has firmly planted in the country the republican system, under the motto, "The Government of all, for all." "The Monroe Doctrine," with him, is a principle of action, and has found a vigorous expression in the prompt declaration of war with Spain, when that power undertook to dictate terms to the country which he governs.

Senor Don D. Alvaro Covarrubios,

Minister of Interior and Foreign Affairs of Chile, was born in Santiago, the Capital of that Republic, in 1824, where he received a thorough education, and undertook the profession of the law. In 1849 he was made Secretary of the Legislative Chambers of Chile, and subsequently resumed his profession, in which he acquired a growing distinction, until 1857, when he became member of Congress, in which, acting in opposition to the then Government, he acquired a high reputation as an orator and close debator. On the triumph of the Liberal party, to which he belongs, in 1861, Señor Covarrubios was made member of the Court of Appeals of Santiago, and later called to his present position. In common with his President, he is a thorough American, by instinct as well as judgment.

Col. Don. Jose Manuel Pinto,

Minister of War and Navy, was born in Santiago, in 1821, of unpretending parentage, and holds his present position through high personal merit, as a good citizen, and an intelligent, honorable, and brave soldier. Among his various public trusts may be mentioned that of Governor of the southern provinces of Chile, where his conduct was characterized by equal moderation and firmness. In common with the other members of President Perez's Cabinet, he belongs to the Liberal party.

Senor Don Alexander Reyes,

the Chilean Secretary of the Treasury, was born in 1825. Often elected to the National Congress, he acquired a distinguished reputation as a speaker, and held successively several important public positions. He was called to his present duties in 1863.

Senor Don Frederick Errazuriz,

Minister of Public Instruction, was born in 1822, became Member of Congress in 1849, espoused the Liberal cause, spoke and wrote much until the ideas to which he had dedicated himself became triumphant, when he was called to several distinguished positions, among them member of the Academy of Laws, and finally elevated to his present dignity.

FEDERICK ERRAZURIZ, SECRETARY OF JUSTICE, CHILE.

A BULL-FIGHT

Without Spectators.

There are few summer mornings in Texas that are not beautiful. With a bright sun, a fine south-east breeze blowing off the Gulf of Mexico to freshen and cool the air, none fail to feel their charms; but to the hunter it is inexpressibly delightful to ride through those grand old woods, almost awful in their silence, for hardly any sound breaks it, save the drowsy hum of a bee, or the occasional sharp blows of a woodpecker, as he seeks his insect breakfast upon some decaying tree. There is, too, just that dash of danger so captivating to the real Nimrod, and which our stubble-brushing, stay-at-home sportsmen can never feel. How can they ever know those woodland duels, fought without seconds, where a sure foot, quick eye, and steady hand alone avail to make you hold your own. What if you miss a rabbit? It is nothing. What if you fail to bring down a wild-bull in his charge? Why, unless your guardian-angel is to the fore "salt will not save you;" none but the vultures will ever know how or where you fell, and a rusty gun, a rusty hunting-knife, and a bleached skeleton will be your only monument. Never does any one feel more helpless than with an empty gun and in the presence of wounded large game. A bear there is some chance with, because in his attack he gives you an opportunity of bringing the hunting-knife into play; but the weight and rush of a bull are fearfully against you, unless you have the activity of a wild-cat. In all close encounters, weight having an immense advantage.

It was on a beautiful summer morning when I started to kill a beeve, mounted on my mustang, armed with a 14-guage double-shot gun of Deane's, which threw a ball, patched with greased fawnskin, of very nearly an ounce-weight, and accompanied by my three dogs, Jack, Midge, and Killdevil, broken to run nothing but cattle and hogs. They were trained to keep at the heels of my horse, so that I might sometimes, as I very often did, ride suddenly on to cattle, and get a shot or two. Of course this could only be done by riding up-wind, a point a backwoodsman never neglects, as the sense of smell in most animals is superior to that of hearing, and, I am quite sure, with all the deer tribe, keener than even that of sight. The dogs were allowed, whenever we crossed the trail of hogs or cattle, to go and bring them to bay. On this occasion, I had been riding for about an hour due west from the plantation, without seeing anything of the particular game I was in search of. I had arrived at the edge of an upawn thicket, when all at once the dogs dashed into it, and in a few minutes I heard them open, and a tremendous rush being made in my direction. The stout poles of the thicket crashed, and bent like wheat-stalks; and then, with head down, and tail straight out, level with his back, a mighty bull came thundering on, about 12 yards from where I sat. Although mine was as steady a horse under fire as ever was ridden, still the rush and fierce barking of the dogs made him fidgety, so that I placed both bullets too far back in the bull, the upper one, as I afterwards discovered, grazing the kidneys, and the other entering the paunch. Having carefully loaded my gun, and hid my horse in a thicket, well-knowing that he would charge my mustang as quickly as he would me, I proceeded on foot to where I heard the dogs holding him at bay. I found them in a palmetto swamp, some 200 yards from where I had first shot at the bull, and tried to stalk him, by crawling up under the shelter of the palmettos. But the ground was so soft that I sank in over my ankles at each step; and the palmettos were so thick, and their harsh strong leaves rustled so so much, I could not approach for a certain shot. In such mud, without even a sapling to dodge round, in case I failed to drop him, I thought it better to hunt him on to different ground and thicker timber. The dogs then having presently made the swamp too hot for him, I had the satisfaction of seeing him move to more favorable ground. I took advantage of a large live-oak to advance upon him, and getting within about 30 yards, fired. Unfortunately, just as I pressed the trigger, he lowered his head sideways to gore one of the dogs, and I missed him. In an instant, like lightning, he made for the flash. I stood out, and with perfect coolness waited till he was about six steps from the muzzle of my gun, then fired again; but, to my horror, he did not drop at my feet, as I fully expected. His hot breath was now in my face, his red eyes close to mine, as I turned to run round the tree, when my foot caught or slipped, I know not which, on one of the above-ground roots, and in falling, the bull passed one horn through my light hunting-shirt, tearing most of it off me. Luckily, the impetus of his charge carried him 20 or 30 yards beyond me, and my gallant dogs coming to the rescue, gave me a second or two to swing myself up the tree. There was no time to load, nor even to pick up my gun, and I was barely out of his reach when he was underneath, pawing the ground with his feet, bellowing hoarsely, his eyes bloodshot, the foam tinged with blood, covering face and neck, and chest—the incarnation of baffled rage. Whether his horn or head had hit me, I do not know, all passed so rapidly, but I was stiff and sore for several days after. Having recovered my breath, and the shock occasioned by my fall, I began to think what to do to rid myself of my savage jailer. Hunters are, or ought to be, prompt with expedients for almost any possible case, and my determination was at once formed—to go higher up the tree, find a bough that would do for a spear handle, and bind the haft of my hunting-knife to it with some strips torn from the remnant of my shirt, and then to try and stab him where the head and neck join, as he often came quite underneath me. I had hardly regained my station on the large bough—having met a stout stick which would answer my purpose—when I noticed some unmistakable signs of "grogginess" in my shaggy opponent; his head was lowered, and he was swaying from side to side—a riddle easily read; internal bleeding from my first two shots would, I could see, soon close his career, though he made many a gallant effort to shake off the weakness he felt surely coming upon him. Brave to the last he stood, but at length toppled over. For a moment I thought he might be "playing 'possum;" but as he took no notice of the dogs who were licking his wounds, I saw the game of life was up for him, and descended from my perch, thankful for my escape from what my western friends would designate as a "tight place." Having picked up and loaded my gun, and rewarded my faithful dogs with the offal of the quarry, I rode home, from whence some negroes and mules were dispatched to skin, quarter, and bring in the carcass of as game a brute as ever fell.

TEXAS ADVENTURE—A BULL FIGHT WITHOUT SPECTATORS.

THE VIRGIN, AN ANCIENT INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE.

TERRIBLE were the means of punishment used in England, during what may be called the most enlightened of the mediæval times in England, and when the rack, thumb-screw, and other instruments, many of which are still preserved in the Tower and in the collections of the curious were employed.

These, however, seem insignificant when compared with the inventions which were provided in Germany for the purpose of extorting confession, changing opinion, or punishing for imaginary or | real offences. In the castles of the old German barons, most of them in ruins, engines of death and chambers of horrible device have startled the traveler; although it is not so long since some of these have gone out of use, the memory of them has become a vivid sort of recollection, mingling strangely with the historical and traditionary lore. In the city of Nuremburg, and the surrounding neighborhood, it was believed that in the castle of that city were dark and secret dungeons, and an instrument of death to be more dreaded than even the others which were in use—in grim jocularity this was named the "Virgin," and the threat of her embrace was the fear of all.

AN EXECUTION BY THE VIRGIN, AN ANCIENT INSTRUMENT OF TORTURE.

No one could be found who had seen this engine for the destruction of human life, and a personage member of the Antiquarian Society searched for long time in vain for this curiosity. At length, after adventures which in skillful hands would fill a goody volume, the perseverance of this gentleman was rewarded by learning that a quantity of old iron-work, consisting of battered armor and other matters considered as lumber, had been collected in Nuremburg Castle and sold for waste iron, and that part of it had been selected by an antiquary, who had formed a private museum near the famous old city.

Here, amongst many other rare matters, was found the singular object now engraved. It is formed of strong plate iron, bolted and fashioned externally into the form of a female, the countenance a handsome, and the head-dress rich round the neck shows that it is of the date corresponding with the reign of the English Queen Elizabeth; the front is so formed as to be made to open; at each side are hinges, and in the interior are numerous spikes of between four and five inches long, these are so placed that, supposing an unfortunate victim to be put inside and the doors forcibly closed, these pikes would pierce the body in the most vital parts, some would enter the eyes, breast, &c., at the bottom, in front, a channel has been left for the blood of the sufferer to flow away.

In the Castle of Nuremburg there were found traces of engines even more terrible than the above—for once a person could be suddenly dropped upon a revolving cylinder, in which numerous blades were fixed, and by this process any one could be suddenly taken and cut into minute fragments. At a great depth were dungeons, loathsome in the extreme, into which no ray of sunlight could pass, or from where the voice of man could not be heard from without more merciful would be the embrace of "the kiss of the Virgin," as it was called in Germany, or the operation of the other engine to which we have referred, than to the lingering death from hunger, and without hope, in those dismal vaults.

We shudder and look with wonder at these things, which we hope will for long be preserved for the purpose of making us thankful for our present condition, and showing the advantages of the improved civilization arising from the advancement of knowledge.

THE RESIDENCE OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN,

Craven Street, Strand, London.

THERE are certain buildings in London which, although they have neither any peculiar beauty of architecture, or picturesque appearance, have a considerable amount of interest to every intelligent person.

They have still existing, in Westminster, the identical house which was for some time occupied by Milton, when Latin secretary to Oliver Cromwell; this was also occupied by Hazlitt, who placed, on its wall, a tablet to associate it with "The Prince of Poets." Its garden, in which is a tree said to have been planted by Milton, afterwards came into the possession of Jeremy Bentham, of famous memory. This object, so far as its general appearance is concerned, might be passed by without notice; but who, knowing its associations, could fail to look upon it without feelings of intense interest.

The house in which Chatterton died his sad and untimely death, in Brook street, Holborn, has but little external attraction, and yet, who that has rightly estimated this bright genius, can pass this plain dwelling, without many thoughts which are difficult to describe.

The dwelling-places in which Sir Isaac Newton and other worthies spent a large portion of their useful lives, are still in existence, and few of them have a greater interest than that now engraved, which is connected with a brilliant portion of the career of one famous in his day.

When Benjamin Franklin first visited London, he went to work as a journeyman, in a printing office, in the neighborhood of St. John's Square, Clerkenwell; we have, however, failed to trace anything in connexion with him in that place. He afterwards found employment in the printing establishment of the Messrs. Cox (now Cox & Wyman), in Great Queen street, Lincoln's-Inn Fields; here he pursued, for about twelve months, a life of steady industry, living on the most simple food, and avoiding every description of stimulating drink, notwithstanding he did not refuse to become responsible for the ale scores of his fellow-workmen at the public house next the archway, which adjoins the premises.

During a portion of the time he worked here, Franklin, thinking that the exercise would be beneficial, left his work at composing, and took to the hand-press. A corner on the first floor of Messrs Cox & Wyman's printing house, is pointed out by some of the old men there employed, as the spot on which Franklin pursued his labors; and it is related than when he afterwards visited England, with a great reputation, which extended throughout Europe, he called at this office, and addressing himself to a pressman here at work, said:

"My friend, it is now some years since I worked at that press; let us, notwithstanding, take a pot together."

While working at Messrs. Cox's, Franklin lodged with a poor widow, in the narrow street which leads from the archway on the west side of Lincoln's-Inn Fields. Although diligent inquiry has been made, we have failed to find any distinct proof which of the houses it was in which he lodged.

Respecting the subject of the engraving, there is no uncertainty; here, when he came in an honorable position from his native land, which he had, by his energy and ability, been such an important means of liberating, he transacted important business and received visits from the most distinguished and remarkable personages of the time. It would be a useful plan to mark houses such as those referred to, with a brief record of the associations connected with them, a rule which we should also adopt in this country, where our history is so evanescent from the uncertain nature of our people.

THE THANKSGIVING OF 1865.

NEVER before, since we have had a record of great nations, has one year made so great a difference in their status of happiness as that of the past twelve months in the welfare, prosperity and cause for thankfulness of this country. One year ago we were engaged in a fierce and bloody war, without any knowledge among the people of where it would end, or in what condition the country would emerge. Now we have peace smiling over all the land, and its promise for many years to come. We have hundreds of thousands of soldiers emancipated from the field of arms to the field of labor, and from State to State goes up the hum of reconciliation, and a desire for renewed exertion and consequent prosperity. The lands devastated by the tramp of armies, and the homes laid waste by the invader of either side are once more being brought back to the standard they held five years agone. Hearths that have lost one kind familiar face, one that perhaps lies far away under the mould of some Southern battle-field, strive to close up the gap, and without forgetting the loved one, give thanks that, since he was taken, he should be taken in so good a cause.

A stranger coming among us would hardly believe, looking at our wealth, prosperity and happiness, that but a few months had elapsed since the most terrible war of the last thousand years has just closed; that thousands of miles of territory have been despoiled, and hundreds of thousands of lives sacrificed. And yet in the face of this we have great cause for thankfulness. We are overburdened with natural wealth. We have national recuperative power beyond telling, and we are, as a people, determined upon the ultimate greatness of the nation, and that is the grand secret of all our success.

We, on this day of thanksgiving, do not stand in the position of England at the close of our war of independence. At that time a great thanksgiving was proclaimed, and the nation was making great preparations for it. There was a clergyman in Yorkshire who made up his mind to do up to London, get an audience of the King, and ask what the thanksgiving was for. He succeeded in getting the audience, and asked the king:

"Your Majesty, is it because we have concluded a disgraceful peace with France that we are to give thanks?"

"Oh, no! no! no!" said the King, "not for that."

"Was it because we have lost the Colonies of America, the finest in the world?"

"Oh, no! no! no!" said the king, "not for that."

"What, then, do we thank God for, your Majesty?"

"Oh, thank God," said the King. "Thank God —because—because—because it is no worse."

This is not our thanksgiving.

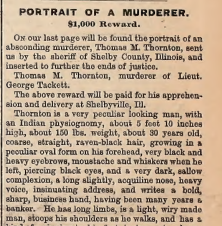
Our soldiers have hung up their bruised arms for monuments, and beneath the grandfather's sword of 1776, and the father's musket of 1814, the son's of 1865, hangs suspended, ready to hang—if the great moral example of the past five years is to have any effect on the world—until all fall with rust on the peaceful hearth.

The camp gives way to the pleasant church and the joys of home, the sword is almost literally beaten into a ploughshare, and the "hard tack" gives place to the thanksgiving turkey and the pumpkin pie.

Verily have we cause for thanksgiving.

PORTRAIT OF A MURDERER.

$1,000 Reward.



On our last page will be found the portrait of an absconding murderer, Thomas M. Thornton, sent us by the sheriff of Shelby County, Illinois, and inserted to further the ends of justice.

Thomas M. Thornton, murderer of Lieut. George Tackett.

The above reward will be paid for his apprehension and delivery at Shelbyville, Ill.

Thornton is a very peculiar looking man, with an Indian physiognomy, about 5 feet 10 inches high, about 150 lbs. weight, about 30 years old, coarse, straight, raven-black hair, growing in a peculiar oval form on his forehead, very black and heavy eyebrows, moustache and whiskers when he left, piercing black eyes, and a very dark, sallow complexion, a long slightly, acquiline nose, heavy voice, insinuating address, and writes a bold, sharp, business hand, having been many years a seaman. He has long limbs, is a light, wiry made man, stoops his shoulders as he walks, and has a kind of swinging to his feet, toeing out; always dresses well, never drinks or gambles, and is generally aristocratic in his manners and associations; talks well and fluently whenever conversing.

He went West or South on horseback, towards the Mississippi, Nov. 21st, 1865, and is supposed to intend to leave the country for Havana, Brazil or England.

The above reward offered will be paid by the friends of the deceased.

TACKETT BROTHERS.

The Brothers Tackett have given me their joint obligation that said sum shall be paid.

SHELBYVILLE, Ill., Nov. 24, 1865.

CANINE SAGACITY.

A GENTLEMAN, one of the survivors of the ill-fated steamer Anglo-Saxon, gives the following narrative of the escape of one of the boats through the [illegible] of her Newfoundland dogs:

"The last time I saw Capt. Burgess, (the commander of the Anglo-Saxon), he was assisting to lower the small boat, in which were embarked twenty-two men, one lady and myself. We left without food, compass or sufficient clothing. We were knocked about in a fog all day, not knowing whither we were drifting. Towards eve, however, we espied a cliff off Belle Isle, when we started for Cape Race, which we made. Approaching the shore, we saw a man carrying a gun, accompanied by two large Newfoundland dogs. He evidently saw us, and made a signal for us to approach the shore cautiously.

"We followed his course for some time, till he was hid from us by a large cliff, which it was impossible he could descend. The two dogs, however, soon appeared, descending this dangerous head-land, and, upon reaching the water, dashed precipitately into the sea, howling dreadfully. Having swam out close to the boat, they then turned close to the shore, keeping a little distance ahead of us, indicating that we were to follow them.

"Our singular pilots seemed to understand the danger of our position, as we did not deviate from the course they were leading us without a loud howl being uttered by them. At last we arrived in a natural creek, where a safe landing was affected. No other similar creek was to be seen, which caused us all to wonder at the sagacity displayed by these dumb animals. No doubt our preservation was in a great measure attributable to these noble dogs. An alarm having been raised, a rope was let down by a pully, and we were taken up the cliff, which is 150 feet in height. We were shortly enable to reach the light-house, where every attention was paid to us,"

The House of BOSANQUET, GIRAUD & CO., Paris, have the pleasure of announcing that they have opened an Agency in the City of New York, for the sale of their WIDELY KNOWN JEWELRY, WATCHES, &c., and for the purpose of making their goods as extensively known and appreciated in the United States as they now are, and have been for over 70 years in Europe, they have determined on a plan by which poor and rich alike may have the advantage of their splendid styles. As a preliminary, they would remark that they manufacture and sell NO IMITATION JEWELRY or WATCHES, but

All are Warranted Gold of the Finest Workmanship.

Our customers will also have the great advantage of a constant succession of NEW and RECHERCHE STYLES and PATTERNS with which we shall keep our New York Agency supplied.

We have adopted the plan of sale, now so popular, of charging a uniform price, and this price will invariably be $2 FOR EACH ARTICLE no matter how costly it may be. The expenses of conducting our New York Agency are paid by the sale of Certificates, or Coupons representing the various articles. These Certificates are sold at 50 cents each, or five for $2, and each Certificate will show the holder the particular article he or she is entitled to, on payment of an additional $2. If the article named on the Certificate is not desired, the holder will oblige us, when he returns the Certificate, by stating what other article of the same value, he or she may prefer, and it will be sent with pleasure. OUR AIM IS TO PLEASE, and every means to that end will be exerted. We solicit a trial from every one who reads this notice, as we are confident of giving the utmost satisfaction.

THE STOCK COMPRISES,

Amongst other articles, Splendid Clocks, Gold and Silver Watches, Rings set with Diamonds, Rubies, Pearls, Garnet and other Stones (solitaire and in clusters), Ladies' Sets of Jewelry, comprising Pins and Earrings, of the most fashionable styles, set in Precious Stones of every variety, together with a large assortment of Gold, Enameled and Pearl Sets, Gold Studs and Sleeve Buttons of the most beautiful patterns, Gents' Bosom and Scarf Pins, and an endless variety of Bracelets, Chains, Musical Boxes, Head-dresses, Combs, Charms, &c. In case any of our patrons are not in want of articles of Jewelry, and would prefer Silverware, we will send, for ANY CERTIFICATE returned to us, a richly engraved SET OF CASTORS, or BUTTER DISH, beautifully chased and plated.

Magnificent Sale!

Gold and Silver Watches, Jewelry, etc., etc.

THE ONE DOLLAR PLAN.

The ENTIRE STOCK of one Gold and Silver Watch Manufactory, two Immense Jewelry Establishments, one Musical Instrument and Sewing Machine Warehouse, one Silver Plating Warehouse, one Gold Pen and Pencil Maker, to be disposed of with dispatch,

WITHOUT REGARD TO COST.

The Goods are of fashionable styles and most excellent workmanship, and are sacrificed in this manner to relieve the proprietors from embarrassment occasioned by a distracting war. It should be prominently stated, also, that they are mostly of

AMERICAN MANUFACTURE,

and therefore greatly superior to the goods imported from abroad, besides saving all the immense duties on importation. To facilitate the sale, will be charged for any article on our list, and this sum the purchaser need not pay until he knows what he is to get. This plan accords with the method recently become so popular for disposing of large stocks of Jewelry and similar productions.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE.

The name of each article offered for sale—as Gold Hunting Watch, Gold Oval Band Bracelet, Pearl Breastpin and Ear Drops, Gold Enameled Ring, Silver-plated Cake Basket, &c., is printed on a card and inclosed in a sealed envelope; these envelopes are then placed in a drawer and well mixed; then as an order is received, and 25 cents for return postage and charges, one of the cards or certificates is taken out at random and sent by first mail to the customer, who will see at once what he can get for ONE DOLLAR. If he is pleased with his fortune, he can forward the money according to the directions on the certificate and secure the prize. If the article forwarded should be unsuited to the purchaser —as for example, a set of Pearl Ear Drops and Breastpin to a young man who could not wear them, and had no one to give them to—we will send any other article from the same department of the catalogue of equal price which may be preferred.

CALKINS & CO., 558 and 560 Broadway, N. Y., are the appointed Managers for the Cosmopolitan Association of Manufacturers, which has been organized with the special object of doing away with the enormous profits exacted from the people by jobbers and wholesale and retail dealers in their goods, making articles, for which the manufacturers receive, on the average, but $2, cost the customer, at retail, from $6 to $12, after passing through three or four hands. This splendid stock of the leading and most fashionable styles of Solid Gold jewelry—watches, silverware, &c., worth $2,500,000 at retail prices—will all be sold by Messrs. Calkins & Co., managers for the association, for $500,000, (manufacturers cost) or an average of $2 for each and every article, subject to the following regulations:—

Sealed Advertisements of the various articles are well mixed, and when ordered are taken out indiscriminately and sent by mail without regard to choice, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the advertisement you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send two dollars and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, Piano, or any article of jewelry on our list, Warranted Gold, for only Two Dollars, and they cannot get less than three or five times the value of the money at ordinary retail price, for there are no blanks, and when not satisfied, the least article, whatever it may be, can be exchanged for a splendid Silver Butter Dish or Castor, heavy plate, valued at $10, or a Fifty Picture Morocco Photograph Album, worth $6. Send 25 cents for an envelope.

Each envelope contains a valuable collection of useful receipts and popular songs, worth many dollars.

Persons ordering envelopes will receive them promptly by mail, postage paid, together with the following premiums upon sending the cash.

2 for 50 cts., with a beautiful Photograph.

5 for $1.00	"	Silver Nut Pick	worth	$1.00
11 for 2.00	"	Silver Napkin Ring	"	2 00
17 for 3.00	"	Silver Fruit Knife	"	3.00
30 for 5.00	"	Gold Pen, Ext. Case	"	6.00
65 for 10.00	"	Gold Double Locket	"	12.00
100 for 15.00	"	Fine Silver watch	"	18.00
200 for 30.00	"	Silver Hunting Watch	"	40.00

In all cases, upon receipt of the money, the premiums as above will be sent with the envelopes.

From the Press.

The Great Gold Gift Distribution.

We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Jewelers Association, with the "enterprises" so often advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser finds, upon investigation, to be mere catchpenny affairs, gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the fag ends of worthless stocks, from the second hand establishments of the East. Not an article is sold by Messrs. Calkins & Co. but is worth all it is represented to be; and, indeed, the well known character and reputation of the firm itself is a sufficient guarantee for the responsibility of the association they represent. Were such not the case, visitors would not throng their establishment in this city, at 83 and 85 Madison street, as they now do, nor would they go away with faces so bright with smiles of satisfaction. Chicago Post, April 1st, 1865.

We want agents in every town and county, and in every regiment, and to those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps

Address CALKINS & CO., Managers, Headquarters, 558 and 560 Broadway, N. Y., or, if nearer, 36 South Fourth street, St. Louis, Mo., or 83 and 85 Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

Announce that all of the above list of goods will be sold at ONE DOLLAR EACH.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war in this country, the supply of cotton, the principal source of Valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent for sale in the United States, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE! Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. have been able to obtain for the principal European manufacturers, have received upon to be distributed gratuitously to the following locations:

Certificates of the various articles are put into envelopes and thoroughly sealed up, and ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, the same as in a lottery. On receipt of the certificate, you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to sell the article or take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR CERTIFICATE.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificate, paying postage and doing the business, the following, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for 1 dollar; 11 for 2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.
The Lafayette (Ind.) Daily Courier, March 18, 1865, says: "We have seen more varied combinations as to amount of jewelry cannot be found on the continent than Arrandale & Co. have now on hand. Arrandale & Co. occupy a high position in commercial circles as men entirely worthy the common confidence of trade. Their statements may be implicitly relied upon, both as to the character of their goods and the manner of dispatch. Ladies especially, in all parts of the country, will find it to their interest to write as early as any of our fair readers desire to interest themselves in the enterprise, that they may have their orders filled."

"GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, &c., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have on hand a large stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered at one dollar each. The distribution is strictly fairly done—every one to take a certificate of a certain article, inclosed in an envelope, and are then at liberty to pay your dollar and then are satisfied with the article, which will certainly be worth more than the money paid, and may be $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar."—Sunday Mercury, New York City, May 14, 1865.

"Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy public confidence."—New York Sunday Atlas and Courier, June 11, 1864.

"We have the first question to be very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and recommend our readers to read their advertisement."—New York Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

"CAUTION TO LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the Great Gift distribution of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been engaged in the sale for a week, but only for her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen by our advertising columns. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged."—New York Journal of Commerce, Aug. 16, 1865.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 26, 1864: "One of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request distributed her 30 articles sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to her agency, and more at times."

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment and in every town and county in the country, and those selling as such will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar, also other inducements which can be had on application. Agents will receive 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us either in cash or postage stamps.

The Dyspeptic.—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and by very many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It may be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicines. HOFFLANDT'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each and all have names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. With nearly 100 Illustrations of the Newest Fashions, and a superb Colored Double Fashion Plate—being a larger number of plates than are published in all the other Ladies' Magazines combined.

With the January number two new features are introduced, and will be continued, being a beautiful copy of some celebrated Parisian painting, colored in exact imitation of the original, and a plate of a Paper Doll, with a complete set of costume, all distinct, and colored to represent a Lady of Fashion in her various dresses. The January number contains a beautiful colored lithograph of the famous painting of "The First Baby"—and a doll model in her walking costume, the articles of dress being separate.

A number of popular Pictures, by the most celebrated Artists, are in course of preparation, and will appear in the February and succeeding numbers, beautifully colored. Subscriptions for the year, $3 50; four copies in one Post Office, $14; with the additional advantage of an extra copy gratis, to the person sending the amount.

Of this most attractive family journal, ISSUED ON NEW YEAR'S DAY, will be PRESENTED, to each purchaser, an elegant ENGRAVING, from the celebrated painting by Faed, now in the possession of John Knowles, Esq., entitled,

"HIS ONLY PAIR."

Lamartine on the Rampage—"A Beggarly Frenchman."

It is not many years since a Frenchman, who had obtained a certain reputation in his own and other countries, organised a grand begging bureau in Paris, with branches all over the world. The mendicant Frenchman, whose name is Lamartine, honored us with a branch of his establishment, and we were called on and adjured, if not exactly in the name of "la Santissima Trinidad," by every other appeal considered as likely to be effective, to bestow our coppers on the poor old poet and ephemeral head of the ephemeral Republic of 1848, in Paris. Known only to a few through his writings, and not very highly appreciated even by those, the mendicant mission to the United States proved a melancholy failure. M. de Lamartine obtained scant return for the humiliation of holding out his hat for alms, on this side of the water. The consequence was much private abuse of Americans by the disappointed beggar, with an occasional public slur on them when the opportunity offered.

It is only lately, however, that the gall of the decadent litterateur, who has become almost forgotten in his own country, has fairly boiled over. He knows that Americans are sensitive on nothing so much as the vindication of that continental policy asserted as long ago as 1824 by their then President, and he knows that they look with ill-concealed irritation and deep anger on the proceedings of the French Emperor in Mexico. Finding a sore spot, under which the nation winces at the slightest touch, M. de Lamartine, disregarding all considerations of truth, right or the consistency of his own political life, so far as he has had one, strikes eagerly at the tender place, with all the vigor of which he is capable under the double inspiration of pique and revenge. The Americans declined to contribute to the support of his follies and profligacy, so "down with the Yankees!" The alternative he gives us is not that of the more manly highway robber, "Your money or your life," but "Your money, or I'll throw stones at you from a distance."

The first proposition of the irate poet is, that Mexico must be held by Europe, as "against the usurpation of the United States," and European right to take this position is demonstrated in the following highly logical formula: "The globe is the property of man; the new continent America is the property of Europe!"

If Europe does not take this position, whether justified or not by this irresistible logic, M. de Lamartine tells his readers that in twenty-five years the entire continent will belong to the United States, through its "usurpations"—albeit, the United States—alone, of all countries on the globe can boast that it never acquired a foot of territory, except through fair and open purchase, or fair and honorable negotiation.

This appeal to the fears of Europe is followed by another appeal to its more sordid characteristics, to its selfishness and cupidity. Here M. de Lamartine draws such a picture of the wealth and future development of America, that we feel all the more stimulated by it to retain our hold on so rich a heritage, and enjoy ourselves the glorious future which he asks Europe to secure for itself by destroying our enterprise and checking our growth. There is a French proverb, which runs, "What is good to have is good to keep," and certainly if the prize we are likely to lose through European intervention is so good, we shall fight for it to the end. We quote the words of M. de Lamartine:

"Thus, who does not know that the grain of America, of the valley of the Mississippi especially, does not constitute the world's granary in case of famine, as Sicily was the granary of the Romans? Who does not know that the monetary capital of the universe is in the immense mines of Mexico, and Peru and Sonora, and that these mines, given up to their natural productiveness by a good system of drainage, will place all the capital in gold and silver of the universe in the hands of the United States, masters of the two Americas? Who does not know that the master of capital is the master of interest, and that Europe, delivered up to this country of monopolies, will be for ever subject to its despotism? Who does not know that, masters of the price of gold and silver, they will be masters also of our most vital industries, and that their coalition already organized against our industry in silks, which rival their industry in cotton, will ruin Lyons, the capital of tissues, and the second capital of France? Who does not know that in depriving us or in depriving themselves by the extinction of the South, of the element of this industry in Europe—cotton—they will continue to starve, as they have already starved, eight millions of workmen in France, more than that in England, five millions in Austria, and thus take Europe by famine at every caprice of their arbitrary interests? Who does not know, in fine, that our commerce and navigation will be subjected to the same destruction as our products?"

As far as this our poet writes in as utilitarian a vein as we presume he is capable of, outside of exploiting other people's charity; but here the old personal grudge breaks through all restraint, and divesting all that he has written of even the semblance of statesmanship, degenerates into mere abuse of Americans. M. de Lamartine is no longer expounder and defender of the Emperor's policy, but a drab, a very scold, and so amusing in his excessive vituperation, that the sense of the ludicrous overcomes the sentiment of pity, excited always when we see an old man, even a mendicant, grind his broken fangs, and snap and snarl like a dog, instead of accepting with dignity the world's forgetfulness, and himself striving to forget the slights of the world.

After saying that the Americans, referring exclusively to the people of the United States, "have scarcely any of the conditions of an American literature," he proceeds to compare them unfavorably, in respect of poetry and art, with the ancient Peruvians and Mexicans. Archæologists will probably fail to suppress a smile over "the poems of quippus:"

"The Mexicans, before the conquest, the pretended savages of Montezuma, the Peruvians with their poems of quippus, were, in that respect, much more advanced. The gigantic monuments of the Aztecs have left on the earth traces of intelligence and of force very much superior, thus far, to the exclusively utilitarian edifices of the Americans of the North. The pioneers of the North do not build for time; the log-splitters only know how to cut down, in order to split up the grand aristocratic trees of the forests, which they see fall with the joy of men envious of the superiority of nature. Their eloquence is the struggle of their legislative assemblies, into which they carry the rudeness of their violent manners, and where brutalities of gesture and of the closed fist take the place of the beautiful moral violences which the great modern or ancient orators of Europe exercise by aid of persuasion or logic, or men of refinement assembled together for the purpose of seeking, in common, after the right and the justice of things."

The "closed fist," we suppose, is the contrasting simile to that of the "open hand"—i.e., the Yankees kept a "close fist" when M. de Lamartine passed round his hat!

We permit M. de Lamartine to go on with his characterizations of American journalism and manners, only confessing to some surprise at finding that, among our many shortcomings, lack of "politeness to women" is not among the least:

"Their journals, innumerable because they cost little or nothing, are only so many recepticles of advertisements of the charlatanisms recommended by the Barnums of the press—receptacles of calumnies and invectives, thrown out daily to the various parties, in order to fasten upon them odious appellations or trivial accusations, so as to discredit one another, and to take away their subscribers. Their 'saloons' are held in hotels; their circles of men, which are tempered neither by good feeling nor by politeness towards women, are only so many clubs of eager tradesmen, utilizing even their hours of repose for their purses, proud to know only that which brings them in money, and entertaining each other only with real or illusory enterprises, by which they may centriple their fortune. Their liberty, altogether personal, has always something about it hostile to some one; the absence of all kindness of manner gives them in general the air and the attitude of some one who is in the expectation of being insulted, or who seeks, by force of pride of manner, to prevent the insults that may be offered him. They have conscience themselves of the continual disagreeableness of their manners. * * * They love no one; no one loves them. It is the expiation of egotists. History presents no parallel of such a physiognomy; pride, coldness, correctness of features, mechanism of gesture, munching of tobacco in the mouth, spit-box under the feet, legs perched against the chimney-jambs or doubled up on themselves, without regard to the respect which man owes to man, an accent brief, monotonous, imperious, a disdainful air imprinted in every feature—this is the picture of one of those autocrats of money."

There Thersites stops for want of breath. To think that all this might have been spared us, if we had only subscribed to M. de Lamartine's "Meditations," at four times their value!

The Evening Post is disposed, and with justice, to distrust what are called the "friendly manifestations" of France towards Chile. We should like to know what sort of a remonstrance Louis Napoleon could make against the conduct of Spain, in face of his own more flagitious conduct in Mexico? It is not usual for highwaymen to reprove each other, and the big thief is generally considerate towards the little one, until ready to rob him of his share of the booty. It would be amusing to see the private dispatch to Madrid, which would be sure to accompany any "remonstrance" from the Tuileries! We can imagine it to run something as follows:

"Virtuous Queen!—They are making a thundering hubbub about Chile, and I must keep the canaille quiet. All right, you know. Go in and win!"

As for the sympathy of Great Britain, it is no doubt real; it is, in fact, a measurable, determinable quantity. Cant plus copper! Happy Chile, to have her troubles react on English selfishness. More fortunate than Denmark, more favored than Italy! To keep copper cheap, and at the same time cheaply extend her influence, are certainly objects worthy of British statesmanship. The modus operandi we leave the Post to explain:

"The remonstrance of England, however, has had some effect; and so far as it helps Chile, it will help also to extend the influence of England amongst the Chileans. This is a point which it is worth our while to consider. Our government has withheld its sympathy from any of the American republics lately attacked by European despots. It has given greater opportunities to the French than to the Mexicans to procure supplies within our borders; it has looked with a cold stare at the aggressions of Spain upon Peru, and the recent unwarrantable and outrageous attack upon Chile. While we are thus by selfishness losing our influence with our sister republics, England steps in, and at the cost of a dispatch, and without any risk or expense whatever, secures the gratitude and confidence of the Chilean government and people. The same act, so far as it makes the British power felt, is of advantage to England all over South America. The people of those States say to themselves, England is a good friend to have—as for the United States, they cannot be counted on; let us then by all means cultivate the friendship of England.

"Thus we quietly suffer ourselves to be pushed to the wall. Is it not almost time to take a different course? We have now a fleet in the Pacific ocean, and a number of men-of-war on the way to California besides. Suppose they should be ordered to look in at Valparaiso. This would cost nothing, but it would at least show our flag there; it would keep us from falling into contempt on the South American coast; it would probably help Admiral Pareja to keep his temper; the sight of two or three American ironclads would give the Chileans courage and the Spaniards caution."

Mr. Sumner has introduced a bill in the Senate proposing an amendment of the Constitution, conformably with the recommendation of the President, namely, so as to make the number of voters, and not population, the basis of representation in Congress. Such an amendment is required on ground of expediency as well as right, and since the total abolition of slavery in the country, becomes of immediate and practical moment. It is intolerable, an outrage upon the free white voting population of the North and West, that the Southern States should have thirty-two members of the House of Representatives, professing to represent 4,000,000, not one of whom had a voice in their election. As matters stand, South Carolina would be entitled to six Members of Congress, from a population made up of 291,000 whites and 402,000 blacks, that is to say, three and a half of her representatives would be of negroes who cannot cast a single ballot. We are not advocating negro suffrage, but the rights of white men. We say it is wrong that 291,000 whites in South Carolina should have greater political power than 700,000 whites in New York, as they have now, and will continue to have unless the Constitution is changed as proposed by Mr. Sumner. As the matter stands the rebellion in South Carolina is a perfect success. It compelled the National Government to emancipate the negroes, and give them two new representatives, without giving the negro constituency a single vote.

POPULAR LITERATURE.

It may seem to the inexperienced an easy matter to cater to the public taste. Many suppose that what is to interest the eye, the head and the heart of the million readers in a country of universal education like this, is as easily got and prepared as the restaurateur arranges his banquet. It is one of the fallacies that any one may turn author, editor or publisher. Yet, if any one whose memory runs back a quarter of a century were to endeavor to enumerate the newspapers, comic papers, illustrated papers, periodicals of all kinds, publishing houses of fame and renown that have risen and vanished, he will be astonished, and admit that after all a certain peculiar ability, a power to appreciate what is intrinsically good, and what people at large will appreciate is the great element for success in this, as in any other business.

Frank Leslie's various publications now form a long list, and his name has become in all parts of the country a guarantee to his readers that the contents of his various periodicals are suited to their wants. This continued success is the highest and surest test of merit. Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper is, perhaps, the most perfect current history of the times that has ever been produced. The world in all its great movements is here photographed day by day. His Chimney Corner is a most comprehensive weekly magazine, a Family Paper of the most unexceptionable character, full of varied and instructive information, Tales, History, Biography, the vast realm of Nature and Art, Travels, reading for ladies and for the young. His German Illustrated Paper, alone of its kind in merit and reality. His Lady's Magazine is without a parallel in its Gazette of Fashion, and in the solidity, variety, extent and talent of its literary matter. Indeed no lady who takes it fails to see the immense advantage which its rich and early fashion plates and descriptions give, while the Magazine, apart from this, is superior in literary merit to almost all the monthlies of every class. His Budget of Fun could fill its columns with a most laughable account of the comic papers with wealthy sponsors, whose birth and death it has beheld, while it has been having its quiet joke with the public. His New Monthly is the cheapest and most attractive monthly of the day, while his Almanacs sui generis are appreciated wherever seen.

Of such a list of successful publications as our readers will find in a preceding column, all carried on at once, it is pardonable to feel an honest pride.

TOWN GOSSIP.

All the world—that is, all the New York world who have been attacked in their noses and ears by the late cold snap, have, by the force of association, been brought to think upon skating, and consequently there has been within a few days a fearful rubbing up of last year's skates, a polishing of irons, and an overlooking of costumes. About this time the younger portion of the public mind is agitated upon the question of ponds and lakes, and is naturally more interested in knowing what is doing, or about to be done, in the ice line than in any other line. Under these circumstances we cannot do a better act than to make a short detail and gossip upon what state the known skating localities are in, and what may be the hopes for the coming season.

Firstly, there is, of course, as the most important, the Central Park pebble. Here, we are glad to state, that the Commissioners have fully realized the importance of making good provision for what is really our national question. To do this they have not only thoroughly put in order the old ponds, but have added to the public domain two new ponds. One of these is the "Conservatory Pond," and has heretofore been kept for private clubs, a keeping that has rather offended the democracy of the upper wards. It is situated just to the Fifth avenue and 73d street entrance of the Park, and will be especially handy for those residing on the east side of the city. The other is known as "Harlem Lake," stands at the extreme northwest, or coldest corner of the Park, and as a consequence is expected to be always frozen. This pond will suit the Harlemites, being nearest to that classic locality, and will likewise suit them, since the other ponds will not be confined with kerosene-lamp liveries. Accommodations the same as at the lower ponds have been put up, fires will be kept all night and day, and the appetite and drinkette can be reasonably satisfied at any time.

At the "Lower Lake" a new building has gone up, a part of which will be appropriated to refreshments and tobacco, so that the finer portion of creation can enjoy their cobbles and cuddles without its being choked with tobacco-smoke and spit into convulsions, as in former years. The boy's skates and the large rock in the centre of the pond have been removed, so that there is now clear skating way of twenty acres and no interruption. The grade of the pond has also been cut down from seven feet to four, and every precaution, such as boilers and ropes, made ready to diminish all chances of accidents. Coupled with this there will be men always on the watch, and if any mimicky fair one does tumble in there are stout and strong engaged expressly for such an event, ready where warm, dry clothing can be had immediately. Nice, too, is that.

Then there is a new pluning-machine, or scraper, which will be employed every night to take off the rough ice of the day, and weather or no weather give the fresh surface as smooth as glass every morning.

At the Lower Ponds the refreshment saloon has been enlarged and the ladies' building refitted. A new stairway has been made from the Fifth Avenue entrance. On the pond itself, in a floating craft, and here the Commissioner shot can follow his native game with all the conveniences. The juveniles also may thank the commissioners for their thoughtful remark to set aside a "Conservatory Hill," near Fifth Avenue and 72d street, for coasting, and, under our early recollections, where such sports were dear to their own souls.

Next comes the Fifth Avenue Pond, where the scene of Lowe's aerial voyage exploded. This under his lordship Major Cesar F. Ottman, whose name is a household word, and to whom no family should be without, this year assume an importance beyond all former years. The pond has been refitted, and every night in evening during the season a band of music will play. When ice is in order, the place will open with a grand masquerade, which will be an event of the season.

At the junction of Fifth Avenue and 59th street a new pond has been opened, called Mitchell's Pond. It is 200 feet by 75, and has buildings and accommodations for skaters.

In Brooklyn a strong effort is being made to attract, and not only the local notice, but the lovers of skating from everywhere. The Cricketers' Club, at the Parade ground, and at the corner of Nostrand and Flatbush Avenues. It is already flooded and waiting cold nights. It covers eight acres, is fenced in and has constructed two stony buildings on its banks, with refreshment, skate and other rooms, and makes a charge of subscription of about $2 the season.

The Union Pond is corner of Fifth Avenue and Third street, Brooklyn. It covers two squares, has comfortable buildings, and orders the attendance of several fancy skaters, who will be always on hand to lead, and keep up a continuous gratuitously the mazy waltz. "The Corbyion House," a relic of the past, stands at the entrance to the Park. It was built in 1766, and was Washington's quarters during the occupation of Long Island and New York in the revolution, the house will be open for public inspection at all times.

Bedford Pond, which is a wash basin of rough ponds about, all of which throw out their attraction, and leave no room for the supposition that there is a lack of ponds.

Having now discussed skating, we will fly to dancing, at least that which is to be had in the great public and entire.

The reason is to be one of more than common excitement with regard to first-class public balls. The great success of many of the large balls of last year has caused the ball-givers and goers to wake up. The year we shall call them the Arion, the Liederkranz, and the 12th Regiment balls, with renewed splendor from last year, but with also some new features, new halls and many new military. The American Club, famous as a supporting house, and especially of those who are the rage, or those who wish to be in, gives a grand splurge at the Academy of Music. The 20th Regiment does ditto, at their own rooms, and it is even whispered that the 69th will not be outdone from the industrial point and do likewise. The fighting is all over, why not the dance go in?

Therefore do we predict that the season will be the great of years in the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

One of the excitements of the week is the Penian hubbub. The simple fact of the whole thing is, that as long as the Irish are poor, by poverty, all is serene and comfortable, but as soon as the cash began to flow in, then came trouble. Some of the whole Irish race seem to have the handling of it, and failing that, declared a war. In Ireland, some total of the funds collected amounts to about $150,000, and the largest of them came from the Roman Catholic Clergy, per Lo'Gorman, $4,000; San Francisco, per Jeremiah Cavanagh, $3,336; Chicago, per Thomas E. Scanlon, $1,000; and Boston, $7,368 99; to say nothing of various sums of $1,000 to $5,000 each.

As the thing stands now, the party is split in two, each struggling for the funds, both declaring they are true men. It is a mighty pretty quarrel as it stands, but we fear much that the whole will not come after all, which says: "When thieves fall out, honest men will come by their own."

Opera goers will regret to hear of the death of Signor Rovere, whose death occurred so lately in his native city of Cropino, in the opera of "Cropino e la Comare."

He had not been ailing since leaving New York, never for a moment, until Wednesday, Dec. 13, was his life considered in danger. Very suddenly in the afternoon of that day, he expired. The immediate cause of death is said to have been congestion of the lungs and brain. An hour before his death, indeed, he referred to the opera of Cropino, which had taken for the thrust trouble, and his medical adviser even encouraged the hope that he might be able to sing on the coming Saturday, when "Cropino e la Comare" was to be given. But he was so shocked by the news of his once removed, as a mark or respect to the deceased, to close the opera.

Signor Rovere was an old favorite with our public. He came to us in 1859 with Max Alboni, and subsequently sang, a day or his. Maretzka's direction, with Mme. Sontag and others. He returned to Europe and remained there for several years, but was re-engaged by his ornar aggressive for the present season. His success in the opera of "Cropino" abundantly proved that his powers were still unbroken. The opera of "Linda di Chamouni" was written expressly for him. Signor Rovere was 60 years of age, and leaves a widow and children to mourn his loss.

There are a class in which art can reach the public, freely to the menial unit and secondly to the great mass. In the first case it may be said to paint a picture of the status. However beautiful it may be, or calculate to refine and educate the people in art, it is subjected to the chance of the rich man's purse and may be considered by the multitude at a private gallery only to be viewed once in an age by himself or some particular friend. This we hold as a great fault to be worth. On the other hand there is the sculptor, who consents to go into the simple group modelled and given for a few dollars a copy to every person who wishes to decorate his or her parlor. Such a group is that of Ringlea, an artist of great merit, who is getting to be public property of excellent pictures, not also copied, but each, as they are brought out, improving upon the last. His group of the bowling is wonderful, and while another artist is engaged in the same subject, he has put it in a grand picture—great in point of size—he will dash off a dozen of the same set pieces, which will be found in each of the Broadway glleries and windows, beautifully framed and glazed, for from $20 to $30, while the artist who paces of the public for very little above the cost of our many engravings. Now, if we can get a picture, or some to the public, a mission in which this paper has so long distinguished.

A few weeks ago we made mention of Ward's elegant new studio at No. 1,260 Broadway, in the Lockwood Room's in Broadway, below Ninth street. We then expressed a hope that the establishment would not be permitted to go into a private gallery, and now we say so. The last time gentlemen, we have but one more suggestion, have served with the artist for a bronze cast of Ward, which is to be put in the Central Park. It is also proposed that until the bronze is ready, the model shall be placed under a glass case in the music stand in the park.

The fire in Quebec in the week has not been eminent. At Wallack's, a new candidate has been introduced in the person of Mr. Lester Wallack, Jr., who will make his appearance in Dreams of Delusion and A Wonderful Woman, and as a new actress, Miss Rose Eytinge. Mr. Robinson could have chosen two better plays to make his appearance in a New York theatre than the above, and we feel satisfied of the audience thought so too.

The week have but one new play to be added, and announced. This establishment is to be under female auspices. Miss Lucy Rushton, late of the Bijou, has not yet been a twelvemonth in this country, has had the courage to take the lease of the old house in the Broadway Athenæum, to-morry the Unitarian Church, and will open it on Monday, Jan. 1, 1866. She is about to erect a piece of amusement, and we feel sure it will be a rich, elegant, and refined one. It belongs to A. T. Stewart, could not be had. That being our reasoning.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The working men of Trenton, N. J., have opened a co-operative store in that city. The "Boston Co-operative Store" is the name. Groceries, the co-operative store sells butcher-meat, provisions, coals, and will soon open dry goods, hats, and glass ware, and a great number of other articles, all at cost prices. The store is a large building, good and pure articles, and sell them at a moderate profit. The business is conducted on the principle that is paid by stockholders, as well as others. In other words, the profits are divided among the purchasers in proportion to the amount of their purchases.

——The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, in calling attention to plumbiar's and tinner's odes offered for sale to the Government, state that the price of copper is selling at 200 per cent. over what it was worth in May last. Tinners' work is also proportionately higher in price. Cotton and corn disappear at night from the fields, sticks and stones have mysteriously risen in regularity, and to such an extent as to seriously alarm the farmers. The Cincinnati Gazette, for instance, says the Courier. Over 600 hogsheads of sugar have been stolen from the plantations of Louisiana, and the best two or three years. The Courier charges the freedmen with developing this system of "every man for himself."

——The Mormons have just received a batch of cruits from Denmark. The Lake paper says: "Their last one of them, apparently, who might not as easily be recognized as a member of the Church of Latter-day Saints. Their appearance, as to this Mormon privilege, proves very unprofitable one; for Mary, in addition to her own baggage, had to carry the baggage of two of them by their proselytes." The arrival of these fair ones, it is said, has given a new impetus to the emigration question among the "faithful." A lot of old bogus, and a good many six or seven-year-olds, were seen examining the new comers, most likely with the object of selecting wives for the coming year.

——The larger portion of the rebel ram Merrimac has been raised, and towed into dock at the Gosport Navy Yard. Most of this famous wreck has now been recovered except the engines and boilers. The principal agency, it was coming, directly following the destruction of the Merrimac, by the rebels, was the ingenuity with which the officers of the sluttered remnants of the Union navy, and the Government, availed themselves of these remains into keepsakes, in the form or walking canes, paper weights, and other articles, and even in the shape of a useful or ornamental character, as teth. Most of the wreck, it is believed, has now been taken up.

——Mary Flanigan, of Jersey City Heights, N. J., sold a cooking-stove to Rebecca Woodward (colored), and subsequently refused to deliver it, on account of getting the balance, went to the house of Mrs. Woodward, and, finding the latter absent, removed the stove at the time, and herself absent at the moment, and carried off the stove. The Woodwards do not appear to have any sympathizable one; for Mary, in addition to her own baggage, had to carry the baggage of two of them by their proselytes." The arrival of these fair ones, it is said, has given a new impetus to the emigration question among the "faithful." A lot of old bogus, and a good many six or seven-year-olds, were seen examining the new comers, most likely with the object of selecting wives for the coming year.

For this purpose, he proposes that the furnaces of factories shall receive their supply of air from the sewers; the latter will thus be emptied of their impurities, and the former, instead of being a destitution, fresh air from the atmosphere supplying their place. He calculates that a furnace which burns 10,000 tons of coal can be thus economized annually in 1,000 hours, and that the air thus burned from the sewers will be supplied with about 140,000,000 cubic feet of fresh air, which will be purified from all its co-tents—daily. He would apply the same principle to the ventilation of mines. It has been partially in use already, on the small scale.

BUYING THE CHRISTMAS TURKEY.

WHAT recollections of our happy days hang about the approaching Christmas and the new Year! What visions of making mince pies and the wondrous Christmas pudding! What stoning of raisins! What delicious nights and hours spent in chipping of citron! What grinding of spice and boiling of cruller! What making of paste and mixing of citron meat. And the whole never again see before those days of innocence, when our mothers and sist-rs, for they were the same, were busily engaged in all the kitchen, on this season, and turned themselves and the whole house into one animated bakery and culinary establishment. We can never forget the mountains of cakes, the shower of doughnuts, when a free lunch was gratuitously laid out between two weeks? When the literal fat of the land ran loose over the whole house, and overflowed upon the neighbors! When our grandma was in her glory, and even down to the advance at the memory of the Christmas approach. All these days will be remembered by us, and by many a gentel, and even the farmer's wife almost repudiates the idea of such menial employments as turkey stuffing and cooking, as unworthy of her exalted position. We are coming upon an age of fashion and display, and we must hasten to record these kindly customs, for soon, they will be no more.

But still while they are here let us dwell upon them. Let us take a stroll straight and talk of "Buying the Christmas Turkey."

On the New Year Eve, either upon the day or evening, that is the time when the Christmas turkeys and geese are prepared for it, brains are dwelling upon it, and dreams are made of it. Every one is thinking and talking upon it, and viewing with calm complacency their flocks and poultry yards, and looking upon the approaching price of turkey flesh upon the Christmas Eve. The gentelmen are thinking of the price, and the ladies are ready every available inch of room to store the stock away from the cold. The individuals are preparing to ready extra trains to bring in the loads and tons of turkey that will be required for the New York and Brooklyn man, and housewives are looking up the thyme and sundry other herbs to be on hand for them to make up the stuffing.

At last on the morning of the day and the night of Christmas Eve, how every market and every store where the poulterers have to do their trade is filled, and they are viewed with critical eyes, and felt with suspicious fingers, for there is nothing more annoying to the housekeeper than to present a tough turkey on the Christmas table. Gentlemen, the individuals are preparing to bring in the loads and tons of turkey that will be required for the New York and Brooklyn man, and housewives are looking up the thyme and sundry other herbs to be on hand for them to make up the stuffing.

THE BOARD OF BROKERS.

Great Opening of the New Building.

For some time past the New York Board of Brokers have been engaged in erecting, on Broad, Wall and New streets, a temple for the worship of Mammon, which, it was believed would surpass any in this country or Europe in point of magnificence. The edifice which was only $600,000.

The main building extends from Nos. 10 and 12 Broad street through the square to Nos. 4 and 6 New street. It is 44 feet in width and 132 feet in length. A wing, three stories in height and 66 feet in length, extends to Wall street. This gives the whole very much the shape of a cruciform church.

It is built of marble and iron, and is absolutely fireproof. The front on Broad street is of pure white marble, that on New street of iron and brick, trimmed with white marble. The principal entrance, which is on Broad street, is by a flight of granite steps, with a wide Tuscan arch and 19 feet in height.

The hall is 20 feet in general hall, 44 feet in width by 145 feet in depth, paved with tesselated marble, and intended for the transaction of business by the public brokers.

The southern members of the Regular Board is on the second floor, in a room 70 feet in length by 44 feet in height. It is beautifully finished in black walnut, and is the only room in the building in which wood is used. There are seats for 218 members, and a number of chairs are placed upon the back benches.

The basement is very strong. It is built an immense vault 50 feet long, 30 feet wide and 9 feet high. It is built of granite, lined with iron and fire-proof stone. It contains a number of smaller safes, each about two feet square, for the security of stocks, notes and gold, affording a place of absolute security.

The building contains many committee and reception rooms paved with blue marble. At the New street entrance is the room for the large Board of Brokers, now in use. There is also a room for the use of the Board.

There is also a law addition to the public buildings for which our city is famed.

The opening, which the brokers met on Saturday, the 9th December, for a grand opening and christening of the new rooms, and, as a matter of course, was all the joyful exhibits of life were dispensed with as plentifully as the contents of the stocks. For the occasion, several neat and appropriate addresses were made by some of the members. The effect of excited gambling in the room is singing until the great feature of the occasion—the banquet—was served up in the large Board room. Thither they adjourned and partook of a princely feast, which, as Mr. Cutting, President, and Mr. George H. Brodhead, Secretary, did the honors in the most admirable style. The feast was one of mutual friendship. Panama fraternized with Erie, and for the time being Gould and Fisk were forgotten in a flow of champagne and the hurry of oysters.

The Board of Brokers numbers a wonderful institution. In our days the Stock Exchange is to the uninitiated a mystery. They only excited popular notions of "bulls and bears," all fighting and clamoring in the most unintelligible manner.

And above the Babel of sounds may be heard the shouting of the names of the leading fluctuating quotations, Joy, misery, poverty, wealth, all over the land, are dependent upon the fluctuations of the Gold Exchange, Philadelphia or Boston, to one of his customers: "Sell me 100 shares of gold, or I will give the invitation" and at the sound of the five minutes, the answer is clicked, "Have sold you 100 shares." Then, in the Board room, perhaps down town would puzzle's Hindoo or a Fejee islander more than the Babel of sounds would be. And the exchange of "bulls and bears" engage in deadly combat, the former generally getting the worst of it, and the latter the corresponding ordeal, and the latter using tooth and claw most affectionately. Outside are the "curbstone" men by the hundred, dancing and yelling in a manner that would astonish the Feejee or the Land of Dahomey.

Such that it were a sealed book, and no outsider is allowed to tread the mystic boards until he has been introduced and vouched for by some one of the members, advise very visitant to New York, to see the Board in session before they saw the Museum or any other of the curiosities.

THE NEW FIRE DEPARTMENT OF NEW YORK.

We will wager something handsome that even to a large part of the people of New York it is unknown that there has been passed by the last session of the Legislature changes in the domestic economy of the city household has been made, and so silently and swiftly has it been done that the public is unconscious of it. On the same daily paper, the busy, hard-working population of New York read it at last.

Last winter the New York Legislature passed a bill for the reorganization of the Fire Department, and for putting it on a scale of discipline and efficiency, which the Metropolitan Department, and modelled somewhat as the London Fire Brigade.

To carry out this law the Governor appointed three Commissioners, who, after a while had become familiar with the old department, who opposed them tooth and nail from the start, and who, in fact, had been successfully misled by the fact that each of the old firemen as were appointed, were ready to enter into any opposition could do so under pay. That word pay is wonderful.

These Commissioners commenced their work career by appointing an engineer and test tasks, with whose performance they were to be satisfied. Out of the fire engines and tenders, and ten hook and ladder trucks are now in use, and the force is being constantly increased. These engines and tenders, or those of them approved by the Commissioners, are made at the Manchester Locomotive Company of Manchester, N. H. The engines and hook and ladder trucks are made in New York, and include the tenders travel with one. The hook and ladder trucks are also made in New York, and are of the same pattern.

The engine-house one man, called "the watch-b," is always out idle. If a fire breaks out in that neighborhood, he rings the bell in the tower, and within whose time of watch in four hours, when he is relieved by another. Should the fire be in any other neighborhood, where the balance of the men are always on hand, the bell rings, and the horses, which in the fire service can look around him, sit it in action. Each man knows his place, and is in it in a trice. The chief engineer sends the alarm to the central office, which has four wires running from it, and by means of wires to every fire company, from these it is flashed to every engine-house, and simultaneously the bells in the towers ring out. For the lapse of a minute the bells are telling forth the fire alarm, and then the dance by electric telegraph of the station from wheneto proceeded the original alarm. Then the horses, which are always in the stall, the engineer will sound 9, with a pause, and then 5, signifying 95.

Away rattles the engine to the fire, some of the men accompanying it on the hook and ladder truck, which is running in advance. The hook and ladder trucks are the vehicles by which the men, who are trained, suspended under the ladders and so rattle through with speed.

The uniform of the men is dark blue with a silver star on the cap, and a silver shield upon the breast. Their pay is $700 per annum, less remuneration in these days of high prices, considering the risks they run, but the engine-houses, and, as far as practicable, are selected from the men who have served in the volunteer force, and have served their country gallantly in her need.

Such is the new department, but we wondrous improvement on the old. All that was worth retaining of the old has been retained, while every thing antiquated and judgment can recommend is used, and if we have not at present the most perfect fire department in the world, we will have it in time.

Let us hope that the people will have an opportunity of seeing the department in all its glory, as it is their invitation to get up a good parade and show what they are.

Among the gift books of the season, few will compare in respect of inter-st, and fewer still in beauty of typography and illustration, with the Songs of Seven, by John Stuglow, recently published by Roberts & Brothers, of Boston, and of which the London Athenæum says: "The new name, undoubtedly, belongs to a new poet, and this new volume will make the eyes of all lovers of poetry dance with pleasure." Such is the promise of genius, and of a future-love of gold. Here is the presence of genius, and the promise of a future-love of gold which makes itself surely felt in a glow of delight such as makes the old world young again.

THE PORT OF VALPARAISO, CHILE, S. A.

THE ATTACK OF SPAIN ON CHILE.

SPAIN has declared war against Chile, and Chile has accepted the war. Valparaiso and all the principal ports are blockaded, and a bombardment is threatened. Trade has come to a standstill; every one who can manage to do so is leaving this place; money has disappeared; all the banks have stopped for want of funds; in fact, ruin, the most complete, has come upon us, like an earthquake or a flash of lightning; and Valparaiso, which but a fortnight since was teeming with life and activity, will, in a few days more, be all but deserted. I will try to give you an account of how this has come about. As to the dates, I may not be quite correct; but you may rely on the main points of my story.

About two years ago, a small Spanish squadron, under the command of Admiral Pinzon, made its appearance on this coast. It was announced as a "friendly scientific expedition," and as such it was received; the officers and the Admiral were fêted and feasted, and all went merry as a marriage bell.

They had brought with them geologists, botanists, a photographer, and others, who, as it has since appeared, were merely spies, and who, in the name of science, examined the land, preparatory to the real objects of the expedition. The squadron went to Peru, and was there well received, but with a certain coldness, which, at the time, was ascribed to the news of Admiral Pinzon's behavior here having gone before him; but we now know that the real object of the Spanish expedition was already known there in official quarters. The squadron then visited other places in the Pacific, and at last returned to Valparaiso.

By that time, it was openly said that, on leaving this port, they would again proceed to Callao, and seize the Chincha Islands. They left again for the north, and very soon the news arrived that the Chinchas had been seized, as a material guarantee, till Peru should have satisfied certain claims which the Spaniards made against her. The excitement here on receipt of the news was intense. Public meetings were held; volunteers were shipped for Peru. The Chile Government protested against this robbery, and one private establishment refused to supply coal to a Spanish vessel, while the Government here declared coal contraband of war. A scurrilous newspaper (which no one but a Spaniard would have taken any notice of) was published here, in which, it must be confessed, the Spanish Queen and her Ministers were grossly insulted. I must allow, too, that the sending of assistance to Peru was winked at, while great strictness was observed in preventing similar help reaching the Spaniards. Many of these things were certainly not strictly right; but there was nothing which has not been done elsewhere under similar circumstances, and certainly nothing that did not admit of explanation when the first excitement should have passed.

Towards the end of April in this year, explanations were accordingly asked for by M. Tavira, the Spanish Minister at Santiago, backed by the presence of a frigate in Valparaiso harbor, which came in without saluting. The negotiations were many times on the point of being broken off; but at last, on May 20, M. Tavira declared himself satisfied with the explanations given by M. Covarrubias, the Chilean Minister of Foreign Affairs, and every one considered the matter over, not doubting that M. Tavira's acceptance of the explanations would be ratified by his Government. Business, which had received a slight check pending the negotiations, went ahead again with renewed vigor, and affairs in Chile had never looked more healthy than when, on September 13, an express steamer arrived from Callao with the Secretary of the Chilean Legation on board, bringing, as the only dispatch, a copy of the Panama Star and Herald, in which the recall of M. Tavira and the non-recognition by his Government of the explanation he had agreed to were announced, and, further, that a large Spanish squadron, under Admiral Pareja, as Admiral and Ambassador, had left Callao for Chile, with the intention of demanding immediate and complete satisfaction in the most peremptory manner; and, if not conceded, of proceeding at once to extremities.

On the arrival of the regular mail, two days after, this news was confirmed; and on the 17th of September, the first day of the annual festivals for the celebration of the independence of Chile, at 12 o'clock, just as the salute was being fired, the frigates Villa de Madrid and Resalsaca, and the gunboat Vencedora, made their appearance round the point. Admiral Pareja immediately sent his demands on shore in the form of an ultimatum, demanding explanations on certain of the points already mentioned; but requiring, as a preliminary step, that the fort should salute the Spanish flag, which he was kind enough to say should be immediately returned from one of his vessels. He also required that the negotiations should be carried on, on board his flagship.

The time granted for an answer was four days, on the expiry of which the blockade was to commence. The festivities went on as usual, and I never saw the people more orderly or more enthusiastic.

The answer of the Chilean Government was a decided refusal to treat on such terms, and a notice that the blockade would be accepted by Chile as a declaration of war. On Sunday, the 19th, the blockade was declared, and on Tuesday, the 21st, the declaration of war was published with all pomp, and with the greatest enthusiasm, in all the towns to which the news could be forwarded in time.

I will not attempt to discuss whether in the disputed questions Chile is right or wrong, or whether the explanations accepted by M. Tavira were really satisfactory. I can only say that the most abject nation on earth could not have accepted the reopening of the question on the terms proposed by Admiral Pareja, and certainly not the hot-blooded, sensitive Chilenos. They have their faults, but cowardice is not among the number.

Congress immediately voted supplies, and has given the President all but absolute power to prosecute the war with vigor. But, unfortunately, the Spaniards are on the sea, where Chile is powerless, and a long time must elapse before a blow can be struck by Chile. The Spaniards have already ordered off several vessels (neutrals), but six have run in—five English and one French; they have also seized 10 or 11 Chilean vessels, one of them under the English flag, which was hauled down with cheers by the Spaniards. The diplomatic body at Santiago have most energetically protested against these high-handed proceedings, but Pareja accepts the responsibility. It is to be hoped the home governments will back the unanimous protests of their representatives. The greatest sufferers for the present are foreigners.

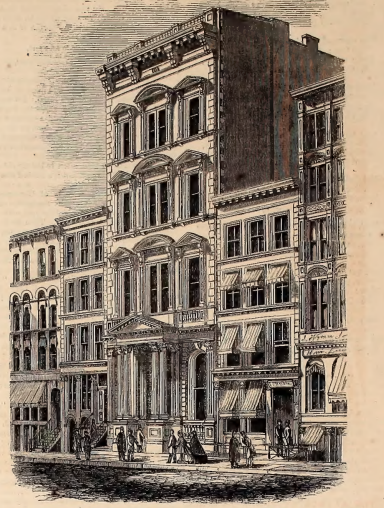
THE LATE WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE.

In the beautiful bay, of which I send you a view, nothing will be left in a few days but a few foreign vessels, hulks, and foreign men-of-war, with the piratical squadron of Spaniards hovering in the distance.



THE LATE WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE.

THIS lamented musician was a native of Ireland. He was born at Waterford, on the first of June, 1814. His father was bandmaster of the 29th Regiment of the Line—an excellent performer on several instruments—by whose instructions the youth profited so well that, before he was 15, he was appointed organist of Thurles Cathedral. He was born with an irresistible propensity for traveling, which he indulged in after life by rambling over almost every quarter of the world. He began his wanderings at the age of 18, when he emigrated to New South Wales, whence he went to Tasmania and New Zealand; from which last place he embarked for the East Indies. After traveling over that country from Calcutta to Nepaul, he sailed for South America, visiting Buenos Ayres, Valparaiso, Havana, Vera Cruz, and Mexico, and closing his American travels by a residence of some length at New York.

During all these journeyings he exercised his profession actively, giving concerts, and gaining renown everywhere by his brilliant performances on the piano and the violin.

In 1845 he arrived in London, whither his name had preceded him; and he immediately took his place among the ablest virtuosi of the day. He now made his first essay in dramatic composition by the production of "Maritana," which was performed at Drury Lane, under the management of Mr. Bunn, and met with extraordinary success, having had an uninterrupted run of nearly a hundred nights. His second opera, "Matilda of Rungary," was produced in 1847. It did not become so popular as "Maritana," though it was regarded by many critics as of equal or even greater merit. Soon after the appearance of "Maritana," he received an invitation to superintend its representation, in a German version, at Vienna. He complied, and "Maritana" was received with as much enthusiasm in the Austrian capital as in London. After leaving Germany he went to Paris, where he was engaged to compose a work for the Grand Opera, when he was seized with a complaint in the eyes, and remained for several months nearly blind. A long sea-voyage being recommended by his medical attendants, he sailed, in 1849, for Rio Janeiro, whence he went to New Orleans and New York, returning to London in 1852.

Here he occupied himself in writing operas for the "Pyne and Harrison company," and in producing miscellaneous, vocal and instrumental compositions. His principal operas were "Lurline," "The Amber Witch," "Love's Triumph," and "The Desert Flower." These, his numerous songs and pieces for the pianoforte, which are well known to the public, have given him a place in the highest rank of English musicians. About a year ago he went to Paris, and was soon afterwards attacked by the long and lingering malady which terminated his life. Having sought a milder climate in the south of France, he died at the Château de Bagen, in the Pyrenees, on the 12th of October last, in his 53d year, deeply regretted for his virtues and amiable qualities by all who knew him.

THE NEW ROOM OF THE BOARD OF BROKERS—THE BOARD IN SESSION.

THE CAPTAIN'S WIFE.

BY G. LEANDER ESBERHART.

Beside his sword there hangs his old blue coat,
And on the shoulders still the golden bars—
In which, three years ago, he marched to fight
Beneath our glorious Stripes and Stars.

One sleeve—the right—you see, is slightly torn;
And five round holes, I think, are in the shirt;
Which tell how fearful was the fray that day,
A rebel missile made him bite the dirt.

Upon the lining of the breast, you see,
Something, oh, God! they say is human gore,
Shed in that sacred cause so near his heart,
By one who now, alas! can fight no more.

Oh! how I loved him; and how often dreamed
That he, to babe and me, again, had come,
As proudly facing as he'd marched away,
Mid blare of bugles, and the roll of drums.

But that glad day, oh, grief! I ne'er shall see;
And though, in dreams, I clasp his form so fair;
From weary morn till weirier night,
I gaze, through tears, upon his vacant chair.

Well, it were meet, perhaps, that I should give
Some reason for my bleeding country's peace;
Some idol of my own devoted heart,
The red, relentless tide of war to cease.

I do not make complaint, but only ask,
That God, in love, will spare my child to me,
That I may teach of his Father's deeds,
And teach him to be good and brave as he.

To make him—if again the cause should rise—
As fit to wear that coat and golden bars;
As brave to fight for God and human rights,
Under our glorious Stripes and Stars.

FORBORNE.

BY LIZZIE B. COOKE.

THE day had been a busy one at the Simonson shipping yards. The skies hung over them with a frown which seemed ill for the beautiful vessel that had just received its finishing touches, and stood ready to be launched upon those waters, which rolled sluggishly and sullen. The workmen had all gone to their homes, for it was long past six, and only Phineas Simonson, the owner, and his Superintendent, Wentworth Huntington, remained. The latter stood regarding the vessel upon the stocks with a look of pride, as he noted its beautiful outlines, for in appearance, and thought, with a warm glow at his heart, that no better had ever left the port to tempt blue ocean depths. A voice, hard and resonant, scattered all his dreams:

"Huntingdon!"

He turned to see Mr. Simonson standing in the doorway of the office, his keen blue eye darting as forehead by the wind, his keen, blue eye scanning him with a look of peculiar interest, holding a business-looking document in his hand. Went worth followed him into the office, deeming that some business in regard to orders recently received was to be considered.

"Take a chair, Wentworth. I want to make some arrangement for the future. You have been in the yards so long that my confidence in you is unlimited. Your duties have been attended to faithfully and well."

Wentworth bowed, and the old man continued:

"I am growing old, as you see, and will not object to pass the business into your younger and more able hands, I—"

A shout here was proud," interrupted Wentworth, "did I, with half your years, possess a tithe of your ability."

"Tush, tush! but here," and he unfolded the paper as he spoke, "I have drawn out an agreement which only demands your signature, and the thing is complete, I think."

Wentworth shook the masses of brown hair off his forehead with a motion peculiar to him, and commenced reading. Mr. Simonson watched him. At first an expression of joy sat on his features, and bid under the lids of his dark eyes; but as he read on the cold, cold, a white ring of pain settled his lips, and the paper dropped from his hands. Mr. Simonson started to his feet, hastily misled a tumbler of brandy and water, and, handing it to the gesture with which Wentworth endeavored to repel him, poured the contents down his throat. Then he bent over the old man's daughter in almost idolatrous affection. It was his only excuse—this love.

"Are the conditions too hard? Think how I have loved you—of all I would do for you—of all I have done!" and the old man's hands trembled, and his voice grew hoarse. Wentworth could not endure it.

"I will sign it," he answered between his set teeth.

The old man handed him the pen, and with almost superhuman effort he affixed his name—Wentworth E. Huntingdon. But there was a boldness of character missing from the usual signature. Mr. Simonson saw it, grasped his partner's hand for a moment, then crushed his hat over his brow, and rushed from the office as though he feared he might relent.

Wentworth arose, staggered to the office door and looked out toward the street. Below the yards lay the beautiful city of B——, and on an eminence, plainly visible, rose the Simonson mansion. He tore away his gaze and it fell on brown, frozen lengths of road woven in between farms that stretched beyond him, bleak and bare under the chilling skies. Far off he recognized the dim centre of a group of trees of which he knew almost every branch. A wild, despairing light leaped to his eyes; one would have thought to have seen him, as he clutched away the scarf from his throat, that some demon possessed him. A voice, broken and harsh, fell upon the stillness. It was old Ben, one of the former hands at the shipping yards. He was singing that old hymn which shall endure as long as souls, and with their own weakness, turn to Jehovah as to a sure and strong resting-place:

"Oh, God, our help in ages past,
Our hope in years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home."

Old Ben was going to his little poverty-stricken cabin, but his niece's loving care made it a home for him, a home that still had a light, if not warmth that he could sing. No wonder that his voice was cheery, and that he always had a pleasant word for everybody. His face was dark and gloomy, but Nellie was his comfort, and there was wondrous pathos in the voice that said, sometimes in the midst of another song:

"I think I'd be glad often to lay my old crippled bones in the grave, but it's Nellie I live for, and I'll bide God's time."

Benny was a great favorite of Wentworth's, and to-night there was a sort of fascination in the cripple's tuneless voice that held him quite still until the last sound died away. Then he locked the office door, thrust the key into his pocket, and turned to take the way home. The darkness fully fell on them, from a moon that looked out of snow-clouds, giving to vessels, piles of lumber and sloops an uncanny appearance.

"I have sold myself for them," he cried; "how can I look Allie in the face and tell her? How many a woman would have done the same, for them to bound free over the waters—as free as my own soul has been. I am a slave now. Where is my boasted honor—where is manhood? Sold! This paper holds the record of my shame. What if I do rise in the world and win an exalted station, will that pay for it all?"

He threw his head from himself, what a fool thing he felt himself to be. Better have disappointed his benefactor than have broken Allie's heart, he thought.

"How can I cast Allie out," he muttered, "and take to my soul one whom I do not love? How can I marry Sarah Simonson, when every day her feel as though a great gulf was fixed between us, while Allie's face will for ever peer out of the dark, haunting me with its sweetness? Well, what is the use—the thing is settled. On the fifteenth of the next month I must stand and before God and man promise to love, honor and protect a woman for whom I feel nothing."

A smile of bitterness curled his lips. He strode on and soon turned into one of the roads that led into the country. Gradually the houses grew less. He could have found them blindfold, so familiar was he with the road, and though the snow fell in the chinks of the fences, and the surrounding ages passed through his mind with relentless tread, and he was powerless to drive them away. He never himself on the bleak, wintry road to the tree, but the very stones cried out to him, and bitter thoughts goaded him. His whole soul yearned for her; but there was a barrier that he stretched his arms out into the darkness, she might have saved him from a fatal decision—once decided nor even she could change him. Why, he pressed?

"How can I give her up? What a fool I was! Yet it is may not be too late. I will go to Mr. Simonson, will beg him to release me, and lose my position and his old man's love. I have toiled for the one, early and late, through weary years, and the other I share with but a single creature. Have I grown to be a part of myself—I cannot live without her—I need her—and now I must lose her. Must?" He rose slowly, the snow falling softly and dotty upon his cap and his coat robes, but he heeded not; the furnace fires were too hot within.

Wentworth flung himself across the road and leaned over the fence. A curse broke from his lips. He and Allie had leaned many a golden summer afternoon over that fence, watching happy birds flutter and wheel through the warm air.

"Poor little Allie," he murmured, "what a brute I am to think of such a thing. To part from you—my life, my love, my only love!"

As he spoke he thrust his hand in his coat pocket, something rattled.

"Great God!" he gasped; "that contract out!"

He sat down again. Would his great love or his ambition win in the contest? Out in the cold night the battle raged fiercely. The moon was yield—and this night, with its mystic silence brooded over by the falling snow-flakes, must be to Wentworth Huntingdon for many years the monument of shame or of noble victory.

Old Farmer Bird's house was two or three miles back of the city, and the latter knew where to find his outbuildings, the boys his orchards, though to do the latter justice they seldom robbed him, because they knew that nobody loved boys hunting, and rollicking, and loafing better than he; no one was so ready to join with them in a frolic, or help to fill their pockets with the ruby and golden autumn fruits. Many a time had old Ben Sutton's prayers been answered by a cord of wood, or load of hay, or bushel of potatoes from Farmer Bird's. The poor of his neighborhood knew and loved him. He was yet vigorous, and though his locks were white as snow, and his heart and hearth had missed the wife of his youth this many a year, yet his face was always cheerful, and if there was sometimes a dimness in his old eyes as remembrance tagged at his heartstrings, the lips never lost their smile. But there nestled on his knee, in his heart, and in his home, a bird, whose very voice was sweeter to him than the song of the robins that clustered around the window in summer, in the fall the crumbs—who builded, and sang, and reared their young, and filled the whole orchard at the back of the house with their chirpings and melodies. His pet had her mother's dark-gray eyes and chestnut rings of hair, and complexion with the same delicate tinge on her cheeks that you will find in clustered peach blooms. But his gift to her was her lightsome disposition, and the old man often leaned back in his chair, listening to the sound of her silvery voice in some part of the house—her feet and daintily hands were busy with some household duty —listen, perfectly content, as happy in the exquisite sensation of her voice gone, as an insect basking in the sun—uneasy when the voice was hushed or so distant that he could not hear it. Oh, this gay young girl was the sunshine of his life. He were shipped ,the Father through His gift; his Bible meant something when she read it to him.

And where was Allie this dreary January evening? Her household duties quite accomplished she had gone to her own dear room, and some tender feeling in her heart wrought itself into expression by means of the snatches of songs. Some fancy stilled the songs, and she wound the rich hair around her fingers letting it fall in many ringlets and coronets, with a band of crimson velvet, then buttoned the closely-fitting merino over her slight figure, fastened a plain linen collar around her throat, with loops of soft lace, and in their dusky folds hid a jewel Wentworth had given her—a little diamond cross. "Extravagant boy! She would be better when—" but the sentence ended with a blush and a low ripple of song. She heard her father come in, and giving a last loving look at the appointments of her dress tripped down stairs. Their sitting-room was cheerful as one might imagine it would be, for Farmer Bird was a believer in his purchase of articles essential to comfort, although he scorned "things just made for show. Then, too, Allie's ingenious fingers added those charming effects from the plainest materials. Here were only a rag-carpet, two or three cane-seated rocking-chairs, and a settee—the latter, however, a cushioned with a shaded lamp, and a few standard books, a crimson-covered lounge, crimson curtains shading the windows—all mounted about a bronze clock, a pair of delicate vases filled with paradise grass and some wheat and oats crystalized—yet such was the comfort about it that it had quite an air of elegance. A bright fire glowed in the Franklin—Farmer Bird "couldn't abide stoves." Allie as she came into the room glanced at the clock.

"Why it's eight o'clock, papa. Did you think it was so late? It's almost time for Wentworth to come;" and she went to the hall and took from the sideboard a plate of sponge-cake she had prepared for him, together with a bottle of currant wine, placed them both into the sitting-room arranged them on a little table standing in one corner. Her father smiled as he watched her.

"You're expecting him?"

"But he'll be so hungry when he comes, papa. How dreadfully it snows," she added, as she looked out of the door and toward the gate.

"Yes, I begin to wonder if we had a sleighride to-morrow."

Allie took a volume of Old Curiosity Shop from the table, and sat down before the fire, but instead of reading immediately laid her head on his knee. Very tenderly the old man's hard, furrowed hand smoothed her ringlets—she never touched them that he did not feel something choking in his throat.

"Where did you leave off, paps?"

"At the wax figures, I believe!"

Allie laughed, and commenced. Both were so absorbed that the bronze clock on the mantel struck ten, without noticing it. Finally Fannie Bird glanced up.

"Bless my soul, Allie! it's time your old father was abed; you must need rest. Poor Nell, she needed it too;" and his eyes filled with tears. Indeed he had been flourishing his red bandanna about all the time in a remarkable manner.

"Papa, could anything have happened to him?"

"Foolish-de-doo, child! he's all safe enough; something to keep him, or he'll come to-morrow."

Allie threw her arms around his neck, and kissed him good-night. Poor child—it was a kiss more free from sorrow than she had ever received from her father again! The clock-tops soon ceased in the chamber overhead, and very soon he slept. As for Allie, she threw a quantity of wood on the fire, and sitting down laid the bright flames wove dream after dream from its fiery threads. She could not sleep. The storm raged without, and the wind, with its terrible disaster, shook the clock ramp out eleven. Allie took up the lamp, preparatory to "locking up," but some impulse held her back. She placed it on the table again, and listened—surely some one was outside. She stood a moment longer, and then she distinctly heard a step upon the door-step—the door-bell burst open, letting in the cold draught of air, and —Wentworth. Allie was so startled by his pale face, and the strange light in his eyes, that she could scarcely stammer:

"Why, Wentworth, tell me what has happened!"

Without waiting for a reply she poured out a glass of wine, and held it to his lips. He swallowed it mechanically. Then he brushed off the snow, unbuttoned his overcoat, and drew it off, and then wheeling the armchair to the fire, led Allie to it, and seated himself on a low stool at her feet. Then she seated herself on a low chair beside him, took his cold hands and chafed them into warmth—all without saying one word. He suddenly drew his hands away, caught Allie with a quick movement, and drew her into his arms, pressed his burning lips on her forehead, and looked into her wondering gray eyes. Allie half shuddered. She could not imagine what possessed him, but waited until he should tell her what it was that had so overpowered him.

"Allie, darling!" his voice was dry and hard, "can you bear to hear what I have to tell you?"

"Yes!" she answered, unwittingly, "anything."

"Well, listen! You were a wee thing when I first came here a rough, awkward boy of eighteen. I took a fancy to you—and—Allie, what if I should tell you that the man you have called papa, talked to, played with, and watched for all these years was a villain. Don't start—be my own confiding, trusting Allie a little while longer. You have often asked me about my home. Oh! you know what it is to have father and mother—I could not tell you of mine. I hated to have you know that my parents could exist—hated to tell you that my home was a hell, that my father was a drunkard, and my mother a fiend. They cast me off when I was eight, just years ago ten years ago. I cannot tell you of the schools of vice into which I was thrown—two-thirds make your blood run cold. When I was 18, I entered a shipyard. I began to cultivate my self-respect. I borrowed books when I could not buy. That yard became my school, my college to me. There my ambition to own a yard—to become a man of wealth first dawned, and it has grown with my growth, and strengthened with my strength. At eighteen I was capable of holding a good position, and my employer learning that his friend Mr. Simonson had a child of my own years, offered me for him. You know the rest—that next to you I love the shipyard."

Allie? he continued, "you know that you have become a part of my very life—that I have loved you all these years—that through all time—yea! through all eternity, I shall love you—unless it will be some comfort to hear me say so. How shall I find words to dispel the dreams of years? Allie, I have sold myself for the shipyard; I have bartered my honor and my manliness for Phineas Simonson's daughter. Such was the condition—don't look so white—for God's sake, Allie!"

He had this girl, instead of listening mute and motionless, broken into a storm of grief. She did not have strength in self-justification. As it was, he felt that he had not counted all the cost. He strained her to his heart as though he would crush her to death, and never; kissed her lips as though he would draw her life into his, and then laid her gently on the lounge.

"Allie," he murmured, "do you utterly despise and hate me? Can you, will you forgive the wrong?"

She was moved but uttered no sound. She extended her hand. He grasped it, as a drowning man clutches a floating timber, then dropped it suddenly, and was gone—gone out into the darkness. He had fancied the battle ended—it had but just begun.

Allie heard him go. Oh! what a night this was. She started suddenly to her own room, a different being since she had left it. The iron had entered her soul; she must bear the burning pain alone—alone. She opened the door, but called no comfort there. Would God forsake her, too? Had He cast her off as man had? Was this His answer to her correction? She let the long Wentworth forgotten God, and made a creature her idol? How could she tear this love, interwoven through her past years, out of her life? She must uproot it, but how—how? So she questioned as she sat with her face buried in her hands.

There was a sort of triumph in the thought that Sarah could never know him as she knew him; then came a cold, hard scheme in her mind as she realised that their paths must be apart for ever; that between them lay a chasm which could never be bridged; he could not come her; she might not go to him.

She opened her Bible again, and read—" When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee : when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee; for I am the Lord thy God, the Holy one of Israel, thy Saviour."

She threw herself upon her knees; God would help, her then. And as the day broke in calm splendor on the land, who will say that, in those hours of anguish, Christ did not bend in sympathy with her anguish?

Farmer Bird noticed the next morning that his child's voice had a touch of sadness in it, that her eyes looked dull, that something of her sprightly air was gone. At breakfast she said gayly:

"Father, Wentworth has bought an interest in the shipping yard, and is going to marry Sarah Simonson."

He looked up surprised.

"Why, Allie, I thought he would marry you!"

Dear, innocent old man! he did not know the struggle it cost her to reply:

"Why, no! what made you think so?"

"I thought he loved you," was a remark which drew a smart blush. After the meal was over, as he watched her clear the table in her dainty way, he exclaimed suddenly:

"Now, poor old Ben is getting along this morning! I declare I never thought of him while I ate my buckwheats this morning. Sam, you go over, presently, as that early appeared at the door, "I see yesterday that Ben Sutton's woodpile was pretty low, take the old sled and the horses, and carry a load over. Take along a bag of buckwheat and some potatoes."

"His mornin', sah?"

"Yes!"

Allie had just shaken the crumbs out of Doors for the birds, and folded the tablecloth, which was almost as white as the snow itself. Throwing it over her arm she took her father's bearded face between her hands and kissed it. "Here was love unflinching," she thought, "love always here;" she could not see the shadow almost confolding her. It sent no premonitions to her heard.

"Now," said he, "I must go down to the mill.

Want to go 'long? I'm going to take the new cutter."

"I guess not, papa."

She helped him with his overcoat, wrapped a woollen scarf about his throat, and reached his hat from its peg.

"Now don't take cold, papa!"

"Couldn't if I tried, birdie, in all these wraps."

He went out. Allie leaned out of the door, and watched him lovingly.

"One of God's own children," she thought. As he latched the gate, he caught the glance, and replied with a huge snow-ball, but the girl dodged, and it fell against the door.

She took her sewing, but somehow her needle moved slower and slower, till, at length her work lay idle in her lap, and her hands folded instinctively over it; then, with a blush and sudden recollection, her needle flew faster, but the little hand hopping gaze with the weary head became slow again; two or three tears fell silently. She roused herself, folded her work, and opening the door leaned out into the keen air, She thought she would like to go and see Ben herself.

"I wonder what he will say to me?" she continued aloud, "very likely he is sick. This weather always makes him worse. Any way I'll take him some currant jelly, and some of the glycerine which he loves so well."

The day was lovely, not a cloud sailed over the intensely blue sky; the warm rays of the sun had loosed thousands of icicles, and with a crackling sound they fell on the white mass below, and the birds hopped over the soft snow, picking the seeds from the tall grass-stems which peeped above the surface; pine boughs, weighted down with their white weight, occasionally yielded to the pressure, and cast it off with a smashing sound; now the hoof, winding about the road and across the fields, was not quite frozen, and managed to add a few gurgling notes to the general jolliness.

She heard the merry jingle of sleighbells long before she reached the end of the lane, and Allie stood with their gay company as horse and passing as she emerged into the public road. There were three of them. She knew no one in the first or second, but the third—surely that face cannot as yet see his face—surely, she heard Wentworth's voice. He was chatting gleefully with a young girl beside him. Allie thought he did not see her, but he did; for his face flushed and the sentence he had commenced remained unfinished. The girl beside him discovered her, too, for Allie heard her ask:

"Who is that young girl?" and the reply, intended for quite unconscious.

"Where? oh, that is Farmer Bird's daughter."

She watched them until they were quite out of sight, then, as she realized for the first time the gladness of the day, a great sob came up in her throat. Passionate words came, too. "She hated the sun, hated the snow, hated everything that could be glad, while she was so sad, and above all she hated that girl Wentworth was to marry; she wished she might be unhappy with it all!"

Her delicate hands clutched together nervously; how tight her hood seemed; something suffocated her! She sat down, untied her hood, and gathering a handful of snow, laid it on her burning temples; bitter tears rained down her cheeks, and she shook convulsively. Pride overcame her.

"Can you cherish this man who cares only for himself, who, for paltry gold, has crushed your heart beneath his feet?"

The only answer that came through her sobs, as she swayed to and fro, was:

"I don't want it for him!"

She heard sleighbells again—she must not be seen there, so she tied on her hood, and took up her basket, and by the time she reached Benny's had quite regained her composure. She knocked at the door, but receiving no cheery "come in" she pushed it open, and entered; still she anticipated, Benny was sick. He made no movement as she crossed the room, and she found an old rock a chair beside him that he was asleep. Nellie was not there, there was no one to talk to, so she laid her head on the pillow; it was aching fearfully. Benny moved. His hand sought that of Allie with a caressing motion, and he murmured:

"Sophie—Sophie!"

Allie knew of whom he spoke, his sister, Nellie's mother. She wished he would awaken, the stillness oppressed her; she raised her head, and the movement roused him.

"Oh, Miss Allie, is it you? I was dreamin'——"

"That it was your sister." Allie said; "won't you tell me about her? You called me Sophie, just now."

"Did I? I've been dreamin' about her all night; 'peared as though we was children together in the old home. Them was happy days, Miss Allie!"

"Won't you tell me about Sophie?" she whispered, gently. "Where is she now?"

It seemed to her as though the recital of another's woe would help her to bear her own. The question, though asked so gently, stirred a tide of unhappy memories in the man.

"Oh, don't ask me, Miss Allie, don't!"

He turned away his face, and when he looked toward her again, there were traces of tears on it.

"I will tell you about her," he said, "seems as though my heart would break sometimes keepin' it all in. I hope you'll never know the sorrow that settles the heart so black and dark, that a ray of sun as tho' there wasn't no light nowheres. I feel so sometimes, but I go with it all to the foot o' the cross; I feel better when I know somebody helps to bear it. You see, Sophie an' me was like only children, an' she growed so pretty an' so cunnin' in other ways, that everybody loved her an' petted her—it ruined her at last. We used to play out o' doors all day long, an' hunt nests, an' pick berries, an' sometimes we'd stay in the woods all day long, gathering wild flowers.

"Well, she growed to be fifteen; she was younger'n me by twenty years, but I was a noticable cripple, an' so small nobody took me to be so old. It seen she looked very serious sometimes, an' found fault with her clothes, an' didn't like mother to correct her—tho' mother didn't do it very often—an' 'sed she couldn't bear rag carpets an' wooden chairs; I kind o' wondered at it, but didn't expect nothin' till I see her one day with Tom Russell. He was the richest young fellow in the village, an' as wild as a hawk. I knowed from the way she looked at him, an' she knew him, an' that he'd been puttin' all these notions into her head, an' I says to her:

"'Sophie, I wish you wouldn't go with Tom, he isn't the kind o' company a young girl like you ought to keep.'

"Her eyes was angry as I'd never seen 'em before, when she said:

"'Ben I didn't think you'd talk to me so I don't mind. I care for Tom more than all the rest for you?' an' she hid her face on my shoulder an' cried.

"At first I felt a little riled with her, but as she lay there, so quiet-like, an' the tears rollin' out o' her great brown eyes—oh! what beautiful eyes she had, Miss Allie, brown an' big, an' soft, just the color of her hair, that waved and curled so curlin'—I couldn't help puttin' my arms round her, an' then when she looked at me through her tears, she asked me 'if I'd always be good to her?' I burst out cryin' in spite o' myself. She hung to me till I promised her, then she went into the house.

"I waited round for her, but not a word about the house so still an' sorrowful, that it made my heart ache, an' she did jus' as mother wanted her all the time after that. Well, Sophie was her baby hurt, till one mornin', when I came down stairs, mother asked me where Sophie was.

"'I hain't seen her,' I says.

"She didn't feel very well last night,' says mother, 'so I guess I'll let her sleep.'

"I waited round, for I knew something was so still, that I couldn't bear it, an' went up stairs, but I didn't hear her stirrin', so I stole down again. By-and-by mother went up, an' I heard her scream, 'Ben! Ben!' as though she was scared. I went up. There was her room, tidy as a new pin, but Sophie wasn't there. I been looking, an' she was gone! There was a little folded piece o' paper on the table, with my name on't, an' it mother said. I never could remember what it knowed what it meant—she'd gone off with Tom. I couldn't cry a tear, but a big hate swelled in my heart against Tom Russell. I knew he'd ruined her innocent thing, why, she seemed like a baby to me, an' in the hands o' that man—I wouldn't 'a thought a dog 'd be in 'em. Mother cried an' groanin', an' I tried to comfort her, but 'twarnt no use. I felt quite sure they'd be home one day, an' when Tom got a home and his stores—Tom owned a house there—an' waited to see her. At last I see her come out to the house one day, she was dressed beautiful, an' looked like a princess. Jus' as she was gettin into the carriage, I broke up an' hold out my hat as tho' I was a beggar. She turned kind o' white, an' said somthin' to the driver, an' he drove off. Then she beckt me into the house, an' took me right into her room; then she shut the door, an' I fell on my knees an' begged her to go back to me!

"'Go back, Ben!' she screamed, 'go back! I can't now—it's too late—I never, never, can go back!' an' she fell down on the floor in such a wild look, that I thought she was goin' crazy!

"'Isn't he kind to you?' says I.

"'Yes; don't you see how kind he is—look round!'

"I looked—I hadn't noticed before—an' my eyes was fairly dazzled with the beautiful things, splendid things, an' bright flowers thrown all over the carpet; but there she sat in silk an' jewels, crying like a child. I told her how I'd said I'd never promised to marry her when she got to York, an' now he wouldn't do it.

"'Well, I guess I'm glad with her, an' when I told her about mother, she clenched my arms, an' 'sed:

"'Don't for God's sake! don't Benny! it's no use. I never, never will go back, an' you mustn't come here again. Tom may see you.'

"I found it 'warnt no use, so I went home. Mother was sick, an' she grieved all the time, an' then fever set in, an' before a month she was gone. Then the farm was sold, an' father'd left me much in debt, that there was no child; but it's six years now, six years, an' God only knows where she's been, or what she is now. Oh, Sophie, darlin'!"

Ben paused for the great sobs that rolled up into his throat.

"It seems to me I must find her. Miss Allie."

"We will go together sometime, Benny."

A look of pain passed over his face.

"You! oh, no! you mustn't go; 'twould be no place for you, an' yet she was once pure and pretty like you!"

Allie looked like an angel, as she faltered, with tears in her voice:

"She is a woman—a sister in trouble and in sorrow. Christ loved such on earth—don't you remember what your Testament says? and shall I, weak as she, though never so tempted, refuse to help her—refuse to seek her, lest I should be defiled?"

The only answer Ben gave was a grateful look—a look Allie never forgot.

Having rendered them quite comfortable at the cottage, and restored Benny to something of his usual mood, Allie left them. The story of the morning diverted her mind from her own hopeless wreck. She thought of nothing all the way home but that young, deserted creature. She longed to comfort, to sympathize with her.

Once, in the house, however, and finding her father absent—although it was far past the dinner hour—her loneliness returned. Home had lost something of its pleasant look. Between her and everything she looked at an indefinable something had crept, a something which marred, which—intangible though it was—was noxious to her sorrow, that made her heart lie cold and heavy. There is nothing so terrible as the conviction that those we have loved are lost to us for ever.

She wandered through the house doing twenty things for them, and then gave place to possible reason, save the imperative necessity of exertion, and at last she settled like a weary bird on the sitting-room lounge, the clock struck three, and her father had not come. She became seriously alarmed; he never missed taking his meals at home, and at the dinner hour. Above all, when an hour after, when suspense became almost intolerable, a knock at the door startled her. Allie opened it, and Laurence entered, looking quite unlike his usual gay self.

"Miss Bird," he said hastily, "your father has met with injury, he is seated down at the pond. The boys were skating, and Ned Simmons fell through, and as your father started to rescue him, he slipped——"

"Quick! tell me, how was he injured?" Allie gasped.

"For a compound fracture," Ed continued, "we sent for Dr. Lewis, and he has done everything that could be done. Your father insisted upon coming home, and will probably be here in about an hour; I thought I'd prepare you, and help, if necessary, in arranging for him."

"Thank you; what shall I do, Mr. Lowrey?"

"A bed must be prepared on this floor, restoratives, bandages, etc., must be convenient. The parlor, I think, would be a better room for him than this; I will have it taken up stairs, and this seems too much exposed."

She listened attentively. Ed couldn't help admiring this self-possessed young girl as any other woman would have gone into hysterics, and raised the very d——, he schlooguized, as Allie left the room a moment to summon Bridget and Sam.

In the course of half an hour the bed was put up, and rendered inviting with spotless linen; a fire crackled and sparkled with rollicking cheer in the wide fireplace, and last rays of sunlight were allowed to gleam on the walls, and Allie thought in her father's easy-chair, and the centre-table, with its books and work, she would be ready to keep her spirits up." He found the employment rather agreeable, for he lingered until he heard the sleighbells, and then, as the services would not be required no longer, took a short cut home through the fields. It must be confessed that Ed's thoughts were somewhere in the vicinity of Farmer Bird's.

"Wonder how the doctor managed him, he was cross enough about carrying him down to the pond, while a half wished he'd gone and died, Allie would have felt badly. She's what I call splendid—a regular brick—guess I'll call over to-morrow and inquire about him."

And Ed did, but Allie was invisible.

Allie met her father at the door, not having come to the gate, where the two processions might meet, under rather than help. The doctor's face brightened somewhat as he saw everything prepared with such a half wifely, half sisterly air. Her father had fainted, but was soon restored to consciousness, and the first object that met his gaze was that daughter bending over him. He drew her down, and whispered:

"I couldn't stay away from you, birdie!"

"No, father, you never must leave me more."

"There, doctor! don't you see I'm better; hain't I the nicest nurse in the world?"

Thus appealed to, the doctor replied in the affirmative, and leaving minute directions, prepared to take his departure. Allie followed him out.

"Is there danger, doctor?"

"Yes!" he answered gruffly, "he has taken cold; the fever he's got keeps here it will end; and so as I have told you, and I will be over again in the morning, perhaps it won't be as bad as I fear."

The doctor's heart softened as he noticed the expression on the girl's face—it was dead white, and she trembled violently.

"Darned if I don't take 'em," he growled, as he thrust his hand in his pocket for a powder, which he mixed, and almost poured down Allie's throat. She looked at him a moment, with arms akimbo:

"Feel better, don't you? Guess I'll leave you some more, you mustn't get sick—couldn't possibly afford it, and I'll look up to-morrow!"

"Any pain, father?"

"No, not much; but I'm so sleepy—sing 'Rock of Ages,' Allie," and she obeyed, till he fell calmly asleep.

The necessity for exertion quite over; she was again left to introspection.

"Where was Wentworth now?" she thought, it was just about the time she had always watched for him—who waited his coming now?

How sweetly her father slept! She almost envied its utter quiet. Then she thought of the sick Allie must prepare for, and wondered how long if her father should die? The thought was agony, and yet she would not feel so badly, if he could take her with him. Poor child! so young to look for rest in death.

For weeks she hung over her father's bedside. He was all she had on earth. She prayed, in bitter agony, that his life might be spared, prayed as she had never done but once before! She watched, untired, through dull days of pain; through weary, feverish nights, she watched, as never before, for a mother—her soul yearned for a mother's sympathy. Benny was always welcome, and he cheered the poor girl. Often, after looking at her sad, hollow eyes, and pale cheeks, had he gone out to worry over "Miss Allie!" He had a dim perception that Huntingdon had something to do with her sorrow.

The doctor's attentions were unremitting, but his face became grave every day. Allie watched its variations with the utmost solicitude. She knew there could be no hope, and braved herself, that she might feel her father might notice her despondency; for his sake, she assumed a cheerfulness that was far from real. He became weaker as the days went on. The second week in February brought portentous clouds and soughing winds; dead vines rattled against the windows, and trees bowed their naked arms; it seemed to Allie as though the spirits of earth and air were calling for him, and the solemn music filled her with unutterable gloom. At last there came a time when her feet no longer needed to move responsive to every look of her father, when it was no longer necessary to moisten his parched lips with him, soothing his pain with murmured words of tenderness; she sang to him no more in the twilight, or read to him from the sacred pages of Christ. She had held him in her arms and caught his last words, his last kiss and blessing; now she watched the clouded lying still and cold in the dim shadows of the room.

They carried him with bowed heads and tearful faces to the grave. For days after Allie's head lay heavy and sore for them, and bending over him they dropped tearful tributes of genuine sorrow; thoughtless boys clustered on the outside of churches to see them that hushed boisterous laugh and jest; while Allie, tearless, stood at the head of the grave leaning on crippled Benny, and clasping Sophie's child.

The clods rattled on the coffin, and though those rough men lowered each spadeful with a hoarse sigh of sympathy, at each sound Allie's face and lips grew whiter.

"Earth to earth—ashes to ashes—dust to dust."

Allie saw no more—in her ears, now like a wailing voice, and again with trumpet-tongue calling her to lie beside him. One after another the mourners turned away, leaving Allie with Benny and the child, yet still the words rang in her ears:

"Earth to earth—ashes to ashes—dust to dust."

Then, as the carriage rolled away, Allie gave her self up to the darkness that had always lain in a cold, and took her home. Then she fainted, and was borne to her room by kind friends.

A pleasant day in spring. Earth's myriad voices woke, and beneath the soft brown mould the seeds germinated, while above the trees showed full in showers of white and rose; in hidden woodsdells delicate flowers swayed; the dogwood trees were white, and coquettes peeped out here and there, in sunny steps. Allie roused, to see Dr. Lewis standing beside her, Bridget and Sam weeping at the foot of the bed, and Benny sitting apart with his head buried in his hands.

The doctor's care-seamed face broke into a smile.

"Thank God! thank God! she's saved!" he cried.

"What beautiful flowers! Why, doctor, what's the matter with me? I can't get up!"

"No! but you will, soon; you've been sick, Allie," and he bent down to stroke her hair; a little pallid face—not a tear—no sad moans.

Allie smiled. She felt very tired, and soon fell asleep, to awake again to new freshness—new life. And now came the gifts of flowers and fruits every day; and as she grew stronger, books. She marveled who it could be! One day she asked Bridget.

"An' shure it's the same jintleman as was here sailin' ivery day about ye; shure I can't recollict his name at all, at all."

"Was he here before I was sick?"

"Yes, miss, the day the doctor brought——" and she let the rest die on her accent. Allie felt something rising in her throat as she thought of that fearful day.

"Mr. Lowrey?" she suggested.

"That's it! an' shure that's the name. I'd clane forgot it intirely!"

A little hope had dawned in Allie's mind. She asked it once.

After Allie had fully recovered, while the air was yet balmy and sweet, inviting to holy thought and living, she remembered her promise to Benny, and they sought the lost one through darkness and storm, and entirely successful, through noisome places and haunts, splendor-coated—yet none the less evil—and last, found her dwelling. Allie's heart beat as she recalled the story, when they told her of the home waiting for her, she clasped Allie's hands, and followed her.

Some years of unutterable misery! could the future store any peace for her? As they passed through the streets people gazed at her, questioning, indifferent, some stared and women patted their dresses closer, while the shrinking creature clung to her protectress. Allie's heart ached. She ached both for him in drug store, and sent Benny for a carriage.

"Sophie should not be insulted!" she said, with flashing eyes.

Ah, Allie! your first lessons in the world's faith and charity were bitter! "Insult Sophie!" Society would have laughed to scorn your holy indignation! Society shuts its gates against sin as she, and when, repentant and stricken, they turn, knocking with the wailing cry for real admauning walls reaching up to heaven—down to the depths—no hope, no comfort for them there. Society crushes them with an iron hand, looks at them out of stony eyes, scoffs at agonizing prayers, heeds no bitterness of remorseful tears; and thousands rush from its pitilessness and seek a deeper woe, a deeper wretchedness, tasting on earth the torments of hell.

Woman, reared daintily, clad in "purple and fine linen," the blood of your sisters are on your skirts—it cries out to heaven! How will you still that cry? How will you answer for it before that tribunal where you shall hereafter stand?

Man, look to it! fouled with impurity, your hearts reeking with evil, the blood of innocents on your souls, accept these confessions you with smile and caress. Look to it, that in the hereafter your condemnation may not be an hundred fold!

Darker and darker loomed the clouds above the political horizon of our country; mutterings of fiery-tongued war grew louder, until they rolled in startling thunder tones, and still the North slept. Then came the firing upon Sumter, and with one heart and one voice the country awoke. The cry "To arms!" pealed out, and thousands from the East, from the North, and from the West, brought to the sword, to gather at the beat of drum, to march forward in steady phalanx, keeping step to solemn melodies, that echoing through the land, stirred the blood and kindled the zeal of every man who had not cast his manhood down to be trodden under foot. And now Wentworth Huntington sought Allie. He knew where to find her. As she kneeled between the graves of father and mother, in the dim twilight, he leaned moodily against a lightning-shattered pine tree. "I was sitting," he exclaimed, "that he should lean there while she prayed." He could not pray, but he watched her as she hid her beautiful face in the mist-specked sod of her father's grave. When she arose, he went to her, his face ghastly white in the moonlight.

"Allie!"

She caught at the headstone for support.

"Allie!" she scarcely knew his voice, it was so changed, "I have come to break the hem of your garment, and yet I dare to love you still—and I will. It's the only thing that keeps me from being a devil. Allie, I am going away my heart. I will become an old man, since—since that night. I shall go to the war, my country calls, and Nemesis pursues. I am going to the war before I weep. Allie I say again that you forgive me—will you not?"

"Wentworth! you turned my day of laughing into mourning; you embittered my life. I thought I stood on a rock—and lo! it crumbled beneath my feet—and I fell, I fell forever."

He caught her in his arms, and placing her on the grave, sat beside her. Long he talked; he felt that it might be the last time. He looked after her wistfully as she passed through the moonlight, then he went back to a home he hated. He had sold himself for gold. He reaped even as he had sown. A bought, with a note crushing it, bearing the oily word, "Good-bye," told Allie of his departure for Washington.

She wrote only about the house as time wore on, she sheered the weary, comforted the sorrowful, wept with mourning ones; and, as accompanied by Sophie, she passed on her way from house to house, the blessings of the poor, the destitute, the stricken, followed her. Doctor Lewis called her his co-worker, and Sophie, with more than envy, when the Chisholms raged, a couple of years later, in the same vicinity.

She was out one morning, taking her usual rounds, when she heard pattering steps behind her, and felt her dress pulled. A little voice, old and strange for a child, said:

"Please won't you come?"

"Come where, child?" and she smoothed back the child's black locks, straying from the little thing's old hood.

"Up there."

Allie looked. It was the Simonson mansion. Proudly it stood, almost disdaining the sheltering arms of the great trees waving around it. As she looked, a sorrowful sigh escaped her frame. But, bending quietly over the child, she questioned:

"For what do you want me?"

"Cause she's sick, and there's nobody."

"Nobody?"

"Nobody but me; and I'm too little."

"How long has she been ill?" Allie further inquired.

"A few days. She was took with a headache and sore throat."

"Where's Mr. Simonson?"

"Gone away, over the water. He won't be back in ever so long. He took me from the Island—he did."

"And the servants?"

"Skedaddled. They said it was catchin'. Coolman's gone, too. I can't do nuch—and, oh, she's so sick!"

The little, childish voice quivered, and the black, elfish eyes, shaded by straight, black, elfish hair, filled with pain, as she begged:

"Oh, won't you come—won't you?"

Allie hesitated no longer. Taking the cold, trembling fingers within her own, she hurried with the child to the entrance of the mansion. She followed the little one's bounds, up soft-carpeted stairways, until her little guide finally opened a door, bobbed her a quaint curtsey, and slipped across the room to the bedside.

"I found somebody, ma'am."

The sick woman looked up—looked with a gratitude, as Allie bathed her temples and arranged her more comfortably, that sank deep into her heart. Evidently Sarah did not recognize her. It was well. Her presence there could add no pang to her last moments, for Sarah Huntington was dying. Nothing could save her. It was too late Had Allie known it sooner, "she sighed, perhaps, God willing," she thought, for her heart melted towards her. Alone, deserted, save by one wee human waif! And she watched over Sarah, tenderly, lovingly. Tenderly, because she was Wentworth's wife; lovingly, because the words she had read that morning, "Do unto others as ye would that others should do to you," thrusted, like a sword, cold, in and out the canvas of her thought. Suffering, too, had made her Christ-like. He was, indeed, her elder Brother.

It was pitiable, but Sarah could not speak. The disease had made too much progress, and when Allie asked her if she would have a doctor, she only shook her head. There was no use suffering—not of the body—wrought in those fair, beautiful features. The face of the woman who had cast her husband's love from her, who hated them, and she remembered the bitter prayer of that bitterest day of her life, "I wish she might be unhappy all it!" The sufferer's eyes met the look of yearning that Allie could not satisfy, until she read to her from the Word.

And so she cared for her until the last. Cared for her—lovingly, tenderly—so that Sarah closed her eyes with the grateful look lingering there, and died with her hand clasped in Allie's.

And now Allie wondered what she could do. If only she might see Doctor Lewis. But she could not leave the child alone. At last her mind became clear.

"Do you know the way to the yard?" she asked the child, who stood gazing at her mistress, lying so white, so mute.

"Yes, m'm."

So she sat down to write a note. She usually carried materials in her pocket, but searched, and found she had forgotten them.

"Can you write any writing-paper?"

"No, m'm. I don't know where nothin' is, unless it's in there," and she pointed to a writing-desk.

Allie shrank from opening it; but there was no alternative. And there, the first thing her eyes fell upon was a letter from Wentworth to—his wife! For one moment a mist came before her eyes, and her eyes became so numb that she could with difficulty move her fingers. Yet she had not forgotten love for Wentworth. She commanded herself, found what she desired, and wrote to the foreman, requesting his presence, if possible; if not, the address of Doctor Lewis, and the name of his relatives, and of Mr. Huntington. Then, wrapping up the child, she sent her off with it.

The foreman came. Allie met him in the grand, deserted drawing-room, and they together made arrangements for the disposition of the body, decreeing to place it beside Sarah's, where Allie's own was in Europe. There was scarcely a hope that a letter could reach him before starting upon his return; nevertheless, Allie resolved to write him such a letter, as she knew how to write, to that old man, so fearfully desolate now. She had finished her task, when the foreman returned, and Allie could not divine how to reach him. God seemed to aid her, for just as the foreman left, and the stood alone with the corpse, his old-fashioned gig passed towards the gate.

The foreman hailed him: and the doctor, as he leaned out questioned, and stopped.

It was a great comfort to see him, and hear him say that she had done quite right, and to know that he would be back in a few days. He promised to send Sophie to assist in arranging the house.

After he had gone, Allie wrote to Mr. Simonson, but the task of writing to Wentworth was spared her. No one knew his address. She examined the envelope of the letter which had so startled her. On the back was written, in pencil: "Last letter, Dec. 1862."

She, herself, had quite lost track of him. She knew he had charge of his regiment—that she fearlessly looking upon death, seeking it with a recklessness almost beyond belief—that he had won for himself renown, but that had been promoted rapidly; but for a weary time she had heard nothing. Two months had elapsed since the date of Sarah's last letter. What might have happened in those two months? Yet, God, she thought, would work out his own ways. Allie and Sophie hovered each other until all was finished. The relatives were all so far distant that they could not be summoned immediately, and, consequently Sophie remained until some one arrived.

After the funeral, Allie returned home, thankful that she had been enabled to care for Sarah as she had—further than that she dared not think.

All through that winter and spring, and through the winters and springs that had preceded, disaster had succeeded disaster in the Union armies, until the people had grown sick at heart. Hope they almost felt, though their lips dared not utter it, that few institutions were, indeed, a failure. Men took up their morning papers with a shudder —women, whose hearts, true and strong, had given all, dreaded if "there" lying, stark and still, on blood-stained fields, dreamt that were too often realities. Worse than battle carnage were the trenches, the malarias of that Peninsular campaign.

But there came a change. On the plains of Gettysburg the tide of defeat was turned back, though at a fearful price. You can see nowhere —only a tithe of that terrible price—should your feet tread its cemetery; only a tithe, for who can measure the woe? Thousands upon thousands for each one of those who lie there, with a board at head and foot. Ah, who would dare to measure it? Yet God does.

Shortly after this battle, in which Wentworth had acted as general, carrying all before him, with his usual impetuosity—when the midsummer's purple splendor glowed on the land, he came again to Allie. He had heard, through the medium of the papers, probably, of Sarah's death. Allie could give him its details. As the round moon looked down upon them, under one of the apple-trees, in the orchard, he said:

"Allie, I have returned to you a better man. This war has been my furnace of purification. Can you trust me once more—as of old? Will you be mine now and evermore—through life, even unto death?"

And Allie, looking up, said:

"Now and for evermore—even unto death."

THE LETTER.

BY ANNIE BRAMBLE.

A LETTER! ah! 'tis a simple thing,
Yet much of joy or woe 'twill bring—
When sealed and bordered black we know,
Before 'tis op'd, it breathes of woe;
But if the seals be red and bright,
We haste to break it with delight,
To hear what friends and neighbors say,
And if they've missed us, while away.
I remember well, one winter time,
(I little thought then, to put it in rhyme),
The winds whistled loud—through the keyholes,
And the ground was thick with the falling snow—
A heavy knock on the door I heard,
And my heart it fluttered, like some poor bird;
I could not tell why—but I felt so sad,
I scarce could say, "come in," to the lad
Who stood on the sill, as he loudly said:
"A letter!" one glance! ah! he was dead!
Yes; he who was dearer than life to me,
Had fallen, while battling for liberty.
A lock of hair, its folds compressed,
That a comrade, severed at his request,
Three years have passed away since then,
Since I lost my all—my gallant "Ben;"
Yet even now I thrill with fear,
When'er the postman's knock I hear.

CHAPTER XLV.—ANTHONY'S INGRATITUDE.

"COME, come," said the lawyer, as Anthony sat last raised his head. "You will regret, I am sure, that you have been so unjust to your cousin, when I own how unjust I have been to you. If it is any comfort to you for me to say it, I will as readily vouch for your innocence in the matter as I would for my own; but you see how a case can be got up when we look only from a single point of view, and when we have only one side to look at. Now I shall give you a pretty strong proof that I desire to be treated as a friend, when I say that I shall keep to my word, and destroy the three little pencil-marks. Go in, then, and make your peace with Mr. Sleuth; or, if that be too risky a thing for you in your present excitable state, take a handsome leave of him, and—"

"I obey," said Anthony, with a peculiar emphasis, and turned on his heel and went in.

The doctor was right. He was so far forgetful of the outrage on his personal dignity—or, rather, the elevating nature of the emotions called forth by the events of the day—as to drive off for the moment all meaner thoughts—that he was sitting before a well-covered tray, busily engaged on a substantial meal, when he saw, on his side, smiling, pouring out wine for him, handing him bread, watching deferentially for his slightest looks or gestures, Anthony Sleuth, seated himself at the table, but it was merely to oblige her father; and she sat there with her right elbow supported on the table, her head resting leaning on her breast, and an expression of the deepest pain on her face. No other persons were present. Anthony took in the group at a glance, and was first tones of command, so loud and haughty, brought Clarissa and Sleuth to their feet, and made the doctor drop his knife and fork in astonishment at the wonder of what was coming, now that he thought all settled.

"I call you all to notice that Mr. Stamp—oh, here he is, indeed!—has—has—has discovered on the back of the document that has this morning been so strangely discovered certain pencil-marks."

"Pencil-marks, Anthony?" exclaimed Sleuth.

"Pencil-marks!" echoed the doctor. "God bless me! I didn't see them, and few things—how! —and this document, too!"

Clarissa was silent, but gazing in deep earnestness of soul on the speaker.

"I say nothing," said Sleuth; I did not discover them. They were shown to me. But being shown, I discover in them two facts. The first is, they look as if I had written them. With that he I cannot deal now. As God is my judge, I affirm they were never placed there by me. That codicil never met my eyes till to-day! Believe me or not, that is the truth. Now for the other fact. The marks refer to a letter received by me only the day before my mother died. Some one, therefore, had seen that letter; and, God forgive me if I misjudge, but I believe the writer, the forger—for that is the true description—must have intended to make me responsible for a fore-knowledge of the codicil, for its guilty concealment, and for this burlesque of signature."

"Let me show you how I deal with this imputation on me. There!" He had drawn forth from his breast pocket the deed of gift, and tore it into small pieces quite calmly, and let them fall on the floor.

"Richard Sleuth, all is your own now—all.

"Come to my bedroom—but not, I pray you till I shall have departed from it, say in one hour from this time—where you will find whatever of money, or trinkets, or valuables of any kind I have as the fruits of my temporary possession of your estate.

"It is yours; I doubt not that. How you came by it, answer to God!

"Richard Sleuth—there is another matter I commend to your attention in this presence. There is my uncle's letter. I would to God I might keep it; but I have no right to it now. If his grandson lives, it is you who will obey or violate the wishes of the dead,

"Farewell! we shall never again meet in life, or in death, unless it be to enable me to clear up this stain upon my name.

"Doctor Pompeus and—and—. But while they all listened to hear what else he was about to say when he had mastered the burst of sudden anguish, he was gone!

In less than an hour afterwards the sharp click of a gate was heard. Once more Anthony Meade had passed out of his uncle's house, but this time he felt, as he wiped the dust from his feet, it was for ever.

CHAPTER XLVI.—HOW RICHARD SLEUTH ANSWERED THE ALDERMAN'S APPEAL.

THAT night, under cover of the darkness, two meetings took place of persons now well known in this story. Commencing one of these, the more chapter, we have now to relate what took place by the gate, the five white bars of which could just be seen through the gloom as Sleuth stealthily approached to meet Bob.

That worthy was nowhere visible, till Sleuth uttered a mild cough, when he emerged from the dry ditch where he had been lying, and where he had got very cold and cross, for his teeth chattered, and his utterance was unusually slow.

"Pretty varmint you are to keep a gemman a-waiting in this manner till he's like a hicicle, and can't get a drop of summut hot and strong to begin again to melt hisself. Where's your manners, Mister Sleuth?—where's your manners?"

"I am very sorry, Bob; but you don't know what an anxious day this has been for me. But it's all right at last."

"Par me the money to-night!"

"No, Bob, not quite so fast as that. I'm glad we've met. I've been thinking about that arrangement we made, and I propose to cancel it—rub it out of your very memory."

"What'll I get by that?"

"That's it, Bob, you will get by it. You'll be able to show your wealth, instead of being obliged to sneak about the world, always afraid of the ministers of justice looking after you, thus putting two and two together—I mean your having that wealth, and having been an associate of the robbers of my uncle."

"Better cut it short, Mister Sleuth—much better, I should say. I don't like the sound on it all."

"Nonsense, Bob! Suppose I can put you in such a position that if you choose to emigrate—go where nobody knows you—you'll be able to say, 'It's a safe country, I got my wealth honestly' and sweet it was too, for it all came out of the old fellow's hoards, who didn't want me to marry his daughter, and who was so aggravating about it when I did.' What would you say if I were to put you in a position, not only to say that, but to come up to Boston and get up in a very dignified position as the father who was trusted with all that wealth for the benefit of a scapegrace of a son?"

With a gesture more expressive than graceful, Bob put his finger to the side of his nose, and indicated by that action he understood and appreciated.

"The fact is, Bob, it's awkward, as I told you before, to say, or seem to say, a son to say a son for the mere discovery of a codicil. But if I, as cunningly and promptly carrying out my uncle's wishes, give you ten thousand pounds to enable you to buy a way back to the grandchild, that's not only easily explained, but very much to be admired. We shall stand well, both of us, before the world. What do that plan: I, for my munificence; you, for the trust reposed in you. Don't you see?"

"Couldn't you add an odd thousand?"

"Why, Bob, you rogue! I wish you can't! I take one off. It's better for you in every way. However, please yourself."

"Oh, I'll allow willin' to accommodate. You aint got another paper ready, I suppose?"

"Well, now, Bob, since you ask, that is just what I have managed. And that's why I'm so late."

"How am I to read it?"

"I thought of that. I don't think they can see us from the house if we strike a light. Do you?"

"Crack sure they can't."

Sleuth drew from a tinderbox, and soon struck a light in it by the aid of the flint and steel and a match. He had a bit of wax candle ready to transfer the flame from the match.

Bob read the document, admired it very much, and without a single fresh attempt at extortion, split it into small pieces, and then put his hands back with the other the previous agreement.

Then did Richard Sleuth withdraw himself from his first most perilous relation with Bob, and substantiate for it a document that, whenever made present, could only redound to his credit and universal honor.

Of course, Bob might say it was, after all, the roundest sum he could get, and he would be right; but, after a time, Bob would not be believed, and he (Sleuth) would. Besides, Bob had no more.

Sleuth had not yet done with the cetter. He meant the "case of Rasa" to be real, so far as concerned Miss Egbert's taking him away. They talked long and earnestly, Sleuth at the strip hedge-bottom—having extinguished the candle; and it was agreed that Bob should carry off Rasa either by fair means or foul, and recover with him to Australia.

"I don't be unkind to the lad," said Sleuth.

"Not likely, I should think," said Bob. "Aint I his parent?"

"Will you get him away soon?"

"The werry day—or, leastwise, the werry next day—arter that on which you pay me."

"Well, now, Bob, to do the handsome thing by you, here's five guineas for you to get a decent dress to go in to my bank this day week I've written it's name down in this paper—is on Lombard street. Go there at eleven o'clock, and you will find me waiting for you about the door."

They shook hands and parted; and Sleuth went home cunningly, scarcely able to refrain from crying aloud what was in his soul,

"Perfect! perfect! and not like Anthony's happiness, poor fool! Mine must last!"

He longed greatly for a little genial companionship that night, but it fell out that he was left entirely alone. The housekeeper kept Phillis in her room with her, and all the other servants were sullen and reserved. So the new heir sat by himself in the best room, and drank his own health in the best wine he could find in the cellars, till he fell asleep with his head on the table. And there he remained till the first pure sunbeams of the summer morning crept in, caressing him like the hands of children, who know not whether the thing they touch be good or evil.

CHAPTER XLVII.—ALL NIGHT IN THE GARDEN.

In those days, the evening of Monday was not a busy evening at the Magnet; it drew only its regular customers—a quiet, sleepy set of men, who drank and dozed until they were turned out, to find their feet as they best might; while old Constable Mellins locked on with his lantern, encouraging and sometimes assisting them in their efforts to get to the other side of the horse-trough.

On this particular Monday evening Mr. Peter Peggitt, the landlord, had left them to themselves, and mounted the high stool at the bar, where he was making up his accounts, an office which position he could command not only the door, that opened right before him, and the quiet, homey interior in the taproom, but also the interior of the little parlor, where all the Peggitt family were gathered together for the evening, and where all the talk was being laid for supper.

The jolly Hengston miller, when he came in for his usual evening draught, looked up from his tankard with a twinkling eye, as he saw Mr. Peggitt glance in grim satisfaction from parlor to taproom, and back again from taproom to parlor.

"Here you are, Peggitt," said he, drawing his white sleeve across his mouth; "here you are, lovin' like all three. There"—indicating with his thumb the taproom—"you puts in your whole grain; and here"—winking at the parlor—"comes out your fine flour."

"Umph!" grunted Peggitt, as he heard a heavy thud, and then some snarling in the taproom, "pretty work to turn out the husks, I reckon. Now then, what the——"

The worthy miller had nearly reached the door, when he came back against the bar counter with such force that the landlord's jug splashed full in his face, the lemons in the hanging twine bag hit the ceiling, and the tiers of sparkling glasses rung from end to end.

For an instant, the miller himself hardly knew the cause of this sudden movement; but as the giddiness passed from his head, and enabled him to see, he beheld a ragged little figure, panting like himself.

"Can't you look where you're goin'?" inquired this, the Magnet's last attraction, impudently surveying the breathless miller.

"I ha' you, sir! What do you want?" said the landlord. "Why, you've got your rags on again, have you? Has your master turned you out at last? It's time comin' here after him—he's gone to bed; so be off!"

At this instant there was a stir in the little parlor, and a great "hushing;" and then, breaking the silence that followed, was heard a voice calling from the top of the tiny flight of stairs:

"Peggitt, send the boy!"

"Yes, sir. If you please, sir, I was just a-tellin' him to go up to you, sir," shouted Mr. Peggitt, with sudden zeal. Then, clattering as he met Esau's eye, he added, "Now, then, don't you hear your master wants you."

The miller's angry eye followed Esau as he went up the stairs so unwontedly that Esau, when he turned round and saw it, felt it incumbent on him to nod, and "hope he would know his linniments when he see'n 'em again."

"What's his master a-doin' of here!" inquired the miller, solemnly, when he had disappeared.

"A stoppin' on so as to be ready for the six o'clock coach," answered Mr. Peggitt. "Him and Mr. Sise always sticks to the old room as their uncle always slep' in when he stayed a night in the town."

No more was said on the scene subject then, but the next night the events that had taken their place up at Green Lanes were known all over Hengston, a great deal more was said upon it, and the sanction of the robbery, and other things connected with the alderman's family—so much, indeed, that Mr. and Mrs. Peter Peggitt, the miller and the miller's wife, and the young clerk—who is courting Miss Lisa Peggitt—sat up till they were surprised by old Constable Mullins, on his second round, listening remonstratively with his cudgel on the shutter.

As Esau, still laughing to himself at the angry miller, mounted the stairs, a door was opened at the top, and Anthony stood there.

Esau sprang up the remaining stairs as he saw him, followed him into the room, and shut the door.

"W. I?" said Anthony, throwing himself down in a chair, and his face grew white and blank, as if he were trying to realise the utter disappointment that might in an instant follow his long suspense.

"Well, sir, I see her," said Esau, as soon as he recovered his breath, of which the contact with the burly miller had deprived him.

"You saw her!" cried Anthony, lifting his head.

"Yes, sir; the widder, sir."

"The housekeeper?" in a fainter tone.

"Yes, sir;" and Esau, as he answered, gently slipped a little folded paper on the table where Anthony's elbows rested. It was not sealed, and he soon had it opened. It was from the doctor's housekeeper, and ran thus:

HONORED SIR—I take up my pen, hoping you are well, and beg to inform you I was taken unawares, and doe not know if I'm doing right or wrong; but your boy frightned mee when he came about hurry to buy a topper, though I doe trust a more Christen spirrit wode have staid your hand at the last, and made you remember a man's life is not his own to keep or too cast away.

"What have you been up to, Esau?" asked Anthony, his colour coming back suddenly, and without waiting his answer, Anthony plunged into her letter again—the kind and gentle tone of which seemed hardly to belong to the writer. He had always liked the doctor's housekeeper—a pious, melancholy, old-fashioned gentlewoman, who had been better days,—but now he loved her for it put his lips to the paper in honor of her alone, and not the dear name she wrote.

My young lady (went on the letter) will god send to her from on high, is mending of her grief and sickness, which, Heaven knows I will not be fayned, I am of opinion, being the time my dear and respected master returns to his room for Tomlina to dress his leggy and general Miss Lisa comes to your house servant will be waiting a little within the small gate in the wall by which you were used to come. Dear sir, I am very sad on account for you both; but your fate is in the same hand now as in the poorest beggar prostrate at your feet, and I trust in Him—as must I, also, that this business of tonight bring not sorrow and shame to both, by being discovered by my master, and utter ruin on your humble servant and well-wisher,

MARTHA TOMLINSON.

P. S.—I entreat you to bare in mind that, should my sister in Hengston be required to nurse, I have nothing to look for but starvation, save only that which you will trust over to me.

"Starvation!" echoed Anthony, with quivering lips. "No, no, old lady; not while I've a drop of blood in my body! Esau, what's the time? So late? Then I must be off directly."

"Let me brush your coat, sir," said Esau; and Anthony submitted—remembering how close he had been to the earth when he had last fallen exhausted after an hour's fierce, restless walking.

He looked down on Esau's active little hands, and smiled.

"So you threw your fine toggery at him, did you, you little rascal?"

"I couldn't help it, sir. When he says to me, 'Why, your very clothes come out o' my pocket,' I went and put those on as I'd kept, and did up my own in a handkerchief, and wore 'em myself, and them I've got here; but the new uns I took and scrubbed in the pig-wash, and took into him, and says, 'If they come out of your pocket, take 'em back in your face, an' welcome!'"

Anthony laughed a strange laugh, loud and harsh, and ending in a gulp and low-muttered execration.

"You'd better keep yourself close, my boy," said he, "till we get out of the place."

"I have here and keep the door locked till you come back."

"And how about your supper?" Anthony's hand went into his pocket, and brought out a purse empty. "I tell you what, Esau, it isn't everybody that has supports. Some people object to it."

"I'm very hungry," answered Esau, quickly, "and quite right too."

"Then I suppose we had better object to it, Esau? So I shall not have any supper."

"We can but try it, sir, and see how it works."

"Do you doubt its working well, then?"

"I only says that a hungry man, and you a better night's rest, the better your night's rest is, the hungrier you are at your breakfast; so don't it stand to reason you'll get your supper?"

"Perhaps," said Anthony; and by this time the brushing was finished to Esau's satisfaction, and he gave him his gloves and hat, looking at him with affectionate admiration as he did so.

"You'd better lie down and get a sleep," said his master, as he opened the door. "And don't forget to solve that supper problem on an empty stomach."

"No, sir," answered Esau, bringing the candle to the door to light Anthony down.

The roads were quiet and deserted, and quite dark; and the darkness, though it made Anthony's heart beat more wildly sad, stood him in good stead in other respects.

With what a strange feeling between pain and joy he felt along the dark wall, whose richness of decoration could be guessed at only, while, for the little door—the little door that he might, perhaps, be seeking for the last time. Its top hinge was broken, and it drove a little, while, for the little door—the little door that he might, perhaps, be seeking for the last time. Its top hinge was broken, and it drove a little, while, for the little door, to open it, was obliged to lift it by the handle and press his shoulder to it. He did not lift it high enough to-night, and it scraped along the ground, making more noise than usual, which caused him some moments of breathless alarm. Not that he had any real fear of being discovered by the doctor's servants, but he remembered the two trembling women who were listening somewhere near, and he knew how acute would be their senses, for they would think it could not be himself who came in that clumsy manner.

He managed to close it more softly, and then stood irresolute, not knowing which way to turn in the darkness. He looked at the house, with its lights all extinguished, except those in the trees; and suffered a keen grief as he remembered how he, who now came prowling about it by night, had lived in it and known every room, and to leave it as if he were already its master's son. It was a most sudden and cruel change; and as he stood looking at the dwelling where the doctor's light shone, and thought of him sitting there disturbed and troubled, as he knew he would be, for his daughter's sake, Anthony had a longing to go and make one more attempt at reconciliation; but then he remembered his own beggared state, and turned his eyes from the window almost with a laugh.

Just then, before he had heard a step or heard a bough rustle, his heart began to beat quickly, for he felt that some one stood near him in the darkness.

"Sir, sir!" whispered a voice close behind him; and, turning, he caught two cold, thin hands, and bent over them, asking something more than kisses upon them, and muttering, in a broken voice:

"Mrs. Bishop, you have put a great debt upon me at the beginning of my poverty. I can never pay it, but I shall not forget it to the end of my life. You have been a friend when there is more than one good woman in the world."

"Hush, hush, sir, for heaven's sake! Do not speak so loud. And as for this ring, indeed I will not take it; it is like to get me into trouble. And, indeed, you will stand in need of its value some day. No, sir, I will not take it."

"It belonged to my mother," said Anthony. "You knew her. You must take it—you shall. You will know I did not give it to you before today? There, shut your hand; it fits you beautifully. And, tell me—have you managed it, dear soul? How long? Shall I really see her?"

"Yes, listen. Foolish woman that I may be giving your very bread away. These stones must be of great value."

"Too paltry to have given you by daylight for such a kindness as this."

"Well, now if my young lady is waiting for you in the path by the wall there. I left her on the middle seat. I will wait here, and give you warning if I see any one come from the house. And all the same time, sir, you speak low—my young lady has excellent hearing."

That little path by the fruit-wall! How dark it was, still more darkness than the darkness of night, as Anthony found his way along it. Its mignonette borders smelt sweet, and its fruit ripened with the sun of the day; its very quietness, and the knowledge that she was in it, did not draw the sting from the thought that all those summer mornings he had run across it and at evening—those hours which, though full themselves of delight, seemed to promise—ah, how much more in hours to come! They were brief and rare, but never to be remembered afterwards without a thrill—moments when joy became a pain, as if by its own excess. It showed then in those threatening shadows soon to fall—the dreams dreamt here—the promises spoken here, not because to others they were necessary, but because it was sweet to speak them—all must end in a farewell like this!

When he was a solitary figure on the seat, he felt at her knees, laid his head on them, lifted it, and laid it down again, in an anguish that seemed for great love more than the darkness could answer on it. Clarissa felt it, and trembled from head to foot. She stooped over him, and two tears rolled down her cheeks. She put her arms about him with the unembarrassed tenderness of a mother; her left arm under his to raise him.

"My dear! my dear soldier," was her low! what can I say to comfort you? what can I say that you do not know already?"

Her soft black shawl, that she had thrown over her head, fell about them both. Anthony laid his face on its edge, and they remained still; and the little path that had kept holiday with them in their happiness, and sung the merry and merry music of birds and insects, now, in their grief, remained covered with a pall of darkness and silence from end to end.

For a few minutes this tacit mute embrace satisfied Anthony, and filled him with a peace, deep and delicious, that he had never before known. But it was to last only for a very little while; ere long he began to hunger for something more than that kindness of pity. Sorrow was burning within him a passionate and still-increasing wrath against the cause of all their anguish, and to this he longed for an expression. He would almost have seen her little hands clenched in anger, than clasping him ever so tenderly. More than for her kisses, he longed for words, broken words, of sob, or outcry, against this mortal foe of his. But he kept it in vain. She was kind and all-loving; she only cried.

"Oh, my God, Clarissa!" he cried, throwing away her hands, and starting up. "I wish I could only think that you reproached me a way before God! The thought of leaving so foul a thing near you is the bitterest thought of all."

He rose, and, with his head in his hands, walked a few steps down the path.

"He will be your father's friend—your neighbor," said Anthony; "my darling, how will you bear that?"

"It will be hard to bear," she said; "for how can I speak to him, knowing what he has done to the cause—innocent one, perhaps, but still the cause—of all our trouble?"

Anthony folded her arm, and stood still a minute, then stooped, and took both her hands in his.

"Clarissa, if he is innocent, do you know what I am?"

She made no answer, except to smile upon him a smile which, even in the darkness, he knew. It might have saved him a bitter pang which her silence caused him.

"And do you know what I am in that case?" he said, holding her hands fast. "Let me leave you, my dear no mistake, Clarissa. Listen. This paper was found concealed in a desk of mine. It bears, written in writing like mine, a date which shows it to have been handled a little while after my uncle died. He died an unnatural death, remember that. Suppose it was strangled privately, or trying to revoke, this could? He had sent for me on his deathbed, in a note; playing the return of all his old affection and trust. Is it likely that he could do that, and yet intend to leave me penniless? But he has done so, if all the facts have come out truly. If they have not, who benefits most by their concealment but Sleuth? I wish to be just to him—God knows I do. I have resisted instincts that warned me from the first against him. I can do so no longer. I do distrust him now, and to the most terrible issues. I can say no more. The thing is between Richard Sleuth and I, you see. And now, which is it? Perhaps," he added, letting go her hands, "you have doubts on the question?"

"Anthony," replied Clarissa, sadly clasping his arm again, "as to doubting—as to believing you dishonorable—you know it is only idle talk. I could not do it—if all the events were against you, I could not do it. But I do not like—and I dare not—judge so rashly of your cousin as you do. I have not seen him, but we shall do ourselves no good in being unjust. Now, a thing that happened after you had gone to-day made me half repent the thoughts I suppose I had had of him. I will tell you what it was. He appealed to my father, entreating him to take charge of a sum of money the value of the estate you had refused, I believe—I am sure—because it to your cousin you knowing where it came from. My father refused. I know it grieved him to do so; but as things are between you, he did not see how he could consent. Well, I assure you your cousin had tears in his eyes when he found it could not be managed."

Anthony suddenly broke away, and standing alone, struggled with the most intolerable and cruel pain he had ever felt in all his life. He had found in his side another enemy, that he had not known of till she put her hand upon it, and thrust its poisoned point deep into him. To his anguish was added a new bitterness—jealousy, positive jealousy of Sleuth.

She came to him again, and he received her in his arms, and said:

"Oh, curse him, and his tears and hypocrisy! He knows his way to you, my darling, and will know it still more when you are under his guard, he will come so that I cannot see and strike him on his way! He is stealing to my house, and I shall lose patience with it. He has had struggles, I dare say, and conquer all, I shall lose her—my own, that was all mine! Love sweet, no more for me—but still mine! Love!"

"Yours—yes!" she cried, laughing hysterically. "Yours so soon, that for very shame's sake I was forced to leave you when you almost met with my love even before confessing your own."

She looked up smilingly through her tears, as he clasped her to his breast, and he kissed her passionately.

They heard Mrs. Bishop's steps approaching.

"Sir," she said, from a little distance, "will you please to go?" "your tears now! I fear he may be going to—my young lady in here."

He held her closer.

"My darling! to think I cannot see your face," he said, "not once before I go!"

"Yes, you shall," she said, and take it with you. Here is the little miniature you begged for so long ago, and I refused you. Ah, dear! how proud we were then! But now—but then that, I intend you to take this, too."

"What is it?"

"What is it? Oh, a charm—a talisman that I would not have you go without for all the world."

"What is this paper, Clarissa—money?"

"Yes, I mean it as such. Hush! You know you said once I stood in the place of a mother to you, as you had never known one. Well, now, do you suppose, my dear boy, that I am going to make you his fortune, I have no little stocking heard to give with my motherly advice? Come, Anthony, if you love me, you will go, and you have already kept me."

"Keep your stocking hoard, sweet mother—your son will fight his battles without it. And as for a talisman—I assure you nature will serve. Believe me, I will have none else."

"Now, Anthony, this is unkind! It is, indeed! I treat the gift as a jest. Hush! You know you said once that the bit of bread the lady gave the famished royalist. Take it, my dear—my soldier, and when you are in want, or have feast together, you shall laugh at my poor gift."

"Ay, when! When! Come nearer, my darling. Nearer still. Now, as I can see you, the moon must be rising. No, no; put your little packet away, Clarissa, I will not have it."

"Anthony, I cannot go with you, as I might have done, had that not happened a few weeks hence. I may not claim the privilege of a poor man's wife—keep fires on your hearth, and make good food for you. But you will be sometimes, for the longest way. Now, will you be so cruel as to refuse the little comfort this may bring you? I ask you to take it, instead of the worthless trifles that should be yours. Look, on my knees, I ask you!"

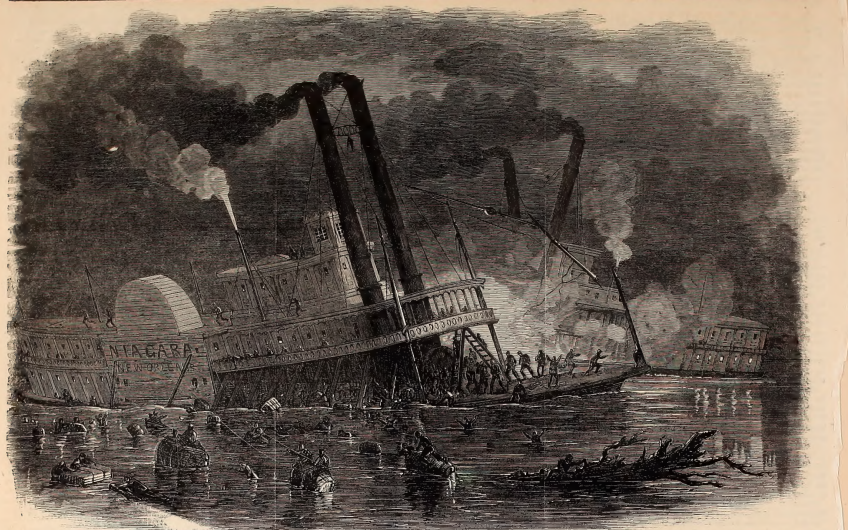
"Well, well. See, I take one note—but mind, with the right of returning it soon—for a careful housewife should keep up her stocking hoard, you know."

"Madam! madam!" cried Mrs. Bishop, coming upon them suddenly from the grass, "my master is coming. He has been to your room, and found you gone, and is looking for you. Sir, for mercy's sake, make haste!"

Clarissa drew to him with a cry, and he strained her to his heart, looking down on her white face in the moonlight, as if it were a last. It might be.

"My love," he whispered, "and his breath, "remember, if you grow weary—if you feel you could be happy by giving me up, and ceasing to wait for me—remember I release you from your promise. You are free whenever you wish to be free—remember that."

She looked up, clung the closer as they went towards the little gate.



Jane Bishop opened it for him, and he went out, but turned to take the little hands stretched out to him through the ironwork.

"Good-by, my love! Good-by—my darling! Good-night!"

"God bless you!" she said, and he dropped her hands, and setting his face against the darkness, went his way.

The same dawn which woke the new heir from his drunken sleep found a certain little room at the Magnet empty. Not by the six o'clock coach but full two hours before it started. Anthony Manfred and his little follower had set off afoot to seek their fortune.

COLLISION BETWEEN THE STEAMERS NIAGARA AND POSTBOY, ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER. FRIDAY NIGHT, NOV. 24.

THE GREAT VIOLINIST, FRANCISCO JEHIN PRUME.

FRANCISCO ENRIQUE JEHIN PRUME was born at Spa, in Belgium, on the 18th April, 1839. At three years of age he commenced the study of music, under the tuition of the great master Nicolas Servias.

At eight years of age he gained the first prize in Solfeggio, as also the first in music, and this over competitors of twenty and twenty-two, the first occurrence of the kind since the foundation of the Conservatory.

A severe loss for Jehin Prume was the death of his uncle in 1849, and it threatened for a time to affect the young artist's future destiny; however, Providence arranged it otherwise. The year of his uncle's death he gave a concert in Spa, at which the immortal Spontini was present, and in admiration of the boy's wonderful execution approached during the performance of the last piece, and, together with Count Cornelissen, crowned him with flowers, the city magistrate also assisting at the ceremony.

His native city, proud of the brilliant success obtained by one of her sons, speedily organised a grand festival, in which Jehin Prume was to be principal performer. He left Brussels for Spa, where his fellow-citizens had prepared him a magnificent ovation. Arrived within a league of the town he was met by the people en masse, with a band of music, while young girls dressed in white crowned him with flowers. In the midst of this universal jubilee he entered Spa.

At night the whole city was illuminated. During the great Festival, Meyerbeer, who was present on the conclusion of a Grand Fantasia, in the "Star of the North," went up to shake his hand and congratulated him.

When seventeen, wishing a more worldwide reputation, he left for Russia, and traversing Germany, he stopped in Dresden, where he gave a concert. His debût was a brilliant one; the city journals placing him among the first violinists of the world. The celebrated Lipinsky gave him the highest praise. Before leaving Dresden Jehin Prume was obliged to give several concerts, and always with the same success. At last he left for St. Petersburg, on his way stopping at Warsaw, where he gave three concerts with the violinist Hauman; in Brest, in Litowshi, in Grodno, in Vilna, where the famous violinist Ap de Ronsky proclaimed him in the daily papers "a great master of the violin," in Dunaburg, in Riga, in Dubeln, in Reval, in Dorpat, in Helsinfors, and finally in St. Petersburg.

Everywhere he met with immense success, unheard of, in fact, before.

In St. Petersburg he was summoned to Court. His Imperial Highness the Emperor Alexander II., complimented him most highly on his great talent, and invited him five times to his palace to hear him.

Jehin Prume not satisfied with his European renown, wished to cross the ocean, to gain one in the New World, and Mexico was the first city that heard the great artist.

Flushed with success he left for Havana, and here again a series of triumphs awaited him. In Havana, where true artistic talent is so well appreciated and honored, they welcomed Jehin Prume as he deserved to be welcomed.

After wonderful successes in Cuba he came to New York, and since that time his music is almost a household word among those who are capable of appreciating the truly great.

Jehin Prume is notable not only as an artist, but also as a composer. His compositions have a rare melodious interest, and a peculiar stamp of genius.

So far we have only spoken of him as an artist and composer; of his personal attributes it still remains for us to speak. His character is eminently good and always unassuming and obliging. Kind to all and charitable to the poor—and in all his travels never forgot them. The following anecdote will serve to give a clearer comprehension of Jehin Prume, and one can judge of his kindness of heart by this single episode—one amongst many worthy of admiration for Jehin Prume. One day, being in one of the great public establishments of St. Petersburg he saw a poor old blind man enter accompanied by his daughter; they commenced playing, he on the violin, and she on the harp; after the performance they went round to collect some money but hardly a farthing fell into the hat. Then Jehin Prume took up the blind man's violin and played a piece, astonishing every one with his wonderful performance, and the collection was made, but this time it amounted to two hundred roubles, or eight hundred dollars.

A FEARFUL COLLISION.

ONE of those terrible affairs for which we are too notorious has just horrified our people—a collision on the Mississippi, and the loss of a hundred lives.

The steamers Niagara and Postboy came into contact on the night of November 24th, about seven miles above Helena, Arkansas, on the Mississippi river. The Niagara was loaded with discharged colored soldiers, and went down in twenty feet water, drowning 100 of them.

The scenes on board are described as terrible;

WOLF SHOOTING AT NIGHT IN INDIA.

the blackness of the night, the shrieks of the terrified people, the puffing of the steam, all combined to create one of the most fearful scenes on record.

The Niagara was a fine steamer, worth $150,000, and is a total loss. The Fostboy was not injured.

WOLF SHOOTING AT NIGHT IN INDIA.

On the first break of day, having assembled a number of coolies as beaters, and taken a delightful bath in one of the sacred fountains, we proceeded to beat the surrounding country for game of all kinds.

The crowing of the jungle fowl, invisible indeed themselves, but heard in every direction through the forest, was the first sound that saluted our ears. A fine peacock now and then rose, with a startling whir, before the beaters, or an antelope, lynx, or hare darted across our path. Emerging from the deep shade, and getting into comparatively open ground, intersected by ravines, full of scrub and low jungle, the solitary florikan and coveys of black partridge afforded us ample sport. Now and then the ominous print of a tiger's or chetah's foot on the sandy bed of a nullah proclaimed the presence of these marauders at no very great distance; but we only obtained the sight of one tiger during this visit we made to Ellora, and that was, when returning, late one evening, through a glade of the forest, we distinctly observed a magnificent royal tiger stalk majestically across the same opening we were pursuing, about two hundred yards in advance, but without taking the slightest notice of us.

The following night, Johnson, having selected a tree to suit his purpose, adopted his usual method of obtaining a shot at the animal; and, having fastened a goat to the trunk of a large tamarind tree, established himself in a fork of the branches, some thirty or forty feet above, with his two rifles conveniently placed to his hand. I mounted a banyan tree close by, with my double gun, loaded with ball. Several hours of the early part of the moonlight night were most uncomfortably spent (by me, at least), undisturbed by any sound save the cries of wild animals in the distance, and the bleatings of the kid beneath us. At length, when nearly wearied out, and very much disposed to descend from my elevated position, and return to my couch amongst the gods, I espied a large gray wolf issue from the forest, and make his way, in a slow, clumsy canter, towards our place of concealment. He had no sooner made a short, ravenous snap at the poor goat, than I heard the sharp crack of Johnson's rifle, and observed the wolf totter and fall on his side, make one or two convulsive contortions, and evidently expire.

No other beast came near us during the night, that we could discern, which Johnson attributed to the dead body of the wolf, and at the first blush of dawn we were very glad to beat a retreat to our tents.

Porcupines, of a large size, were very common in the vicinity of the Caves, and we killed several. We visited some plains, situated beyond the woody districts around us, which elk and nelghau (blue cow) were known to frequent. The great difficulty was to be able to stalk these extremely shy animals, or obtain any cover or hiding-place from whence to obtain a shot at them. Having reached the extremity of the jungle, we observed about half-a-dozen nelghau feeding, on an open spot, on the plain beyond, and with no apparent cover or mode of concealment of any kind within many hundred yards of them. They were very large animals, full sixteen hands high, of a blue dun color, and a sort of mixed breed, between the deer and the cow.

Johnson, on looking carefully around, espied a nullah or dry water-course, through the bed of which he thought we might arrive within shot of the game; and, accordingly, we began to creep, with much caution, along the rugged sides of the ravine, which, although circuitous in its course, evidently took the direction we desired. Many more minutes elapsed of difficult and dangerous progression, when, upon furtively glancing over the edge of our retreat, we discovered that we were within a hundred and fifty yards of the nelghau, and that another turn of the nullah would bring us within easy shot of them.

They were seven in number, and we agreed, in a low whisper, which to select for our respective guns. And now arrived the most anxious moment of our course. On turning an angle before us, it was our intention to rise with the utmost caution, and, resting our rifles, if possible, on the sides of the ravine, take a steady and deliberate shot at the unconscious beasts. This spot was gained and passed, and we were proceeding to put the latter part of our intentions into execution, when suddenly, and within a few yards of us, we were startled by a harsh roar, or rather screech, and a large cheetah sprang up before us, that had evidently been watching the neighbor with quite as much anxiety as we had, and, probably, with much greater appetite. We saluted him on his retreat with the united contents of our guns, but without much damage to his person or temper, and had the annoyance of observing the deer bound away, and vanish in the distance.

LANDMARKS OF NEW YORK.

The Old Hopper House.

THE ancient houses of Manhattan Island are fast fading away before the hurrying hands of improvement, and we have but a few years to record the homes and hearths of our fathers, and fewer still to know those of our grandsires.

This week we put on paper one of the last, the old Hopper House, which still stands, as in the engraving, at the corner of 2d Avenue and 83d street.

This old time mansion was built in the year 1630, by Elias Hopper, the first of the name on Manhattan Island, who also, within 60 feet of the house, built a tower, the remains of which are still to be seen. In this neighborhood, also, first settled the Riker family, a name well-known to New York, and many of their descendants still dwell within a stone's throw of the original homestead.

The Hopper House is yet held by a member of the family, and is in good repair, and comfortable. Its walls show the bullet and ball marks of the British vessels, which, as they went to and fro on the East River, would fire at the old house for amusement.

AN INCIDENT THAT TEACHES.

From the English War against Tippoo Saib.

In our war of this rebellion, we have, without doubt, reached the highest state of engineering at Daraporam, 200 miles south of Seringapatam, Fullerton resolved to divert the route, and take a circuit near the western coast, where the capture of the strong fort of Palagatcherry would afford him a valuable intermediate depot, commanding one of the chief roads from the Malabar to the Coromandel coasts.

SCRAPS OF HISTORY—THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST TIPPOO SAIB.

On the 18th of October he started. After capturing a few small forts, he ascended to high ground, where dense forests, deep ravines and tortuous watercourses embarrassed every yard of his progress; to fill up the ravines before he could drag his artillery over them, to throw trees across them where the depth was too great for filling up, to clear gaps through forests with the axe, to contend against tremendous rains—were only part of the difficulties he had to meet; but he met them like a skilful commander, reached Palagatcherry on the 5th of November, and captured the fort on the 15th, obtaining with it a welcome supply of money, grain, guns, powder, shot and military stores. When the difficulties which Col. Fullerton had to encounter, and the triumphant manner in which he overcame them, are taken into consideration, it will be readily admitted, we think, that his enterprise is well deserving of being recorded as a striking example of what may be accomplished by a union of professional skill and invincible energy.

Our engraving represents one of the devices which Col. Fullerton employed for the purpose of enabling his forces to pass over a mountain torrent.

BLACK SWAN HUNTING IN AUSTRALIA.

THE waters of the lake of which we were in search began now to glisten through the trees, and I could distinctly make out, through a vista in the foliage, a noble troop of black swans, swimming in graceful single file, at no great distance from the edge of the bank we were approaching. Wild fowl were reposing upon or skimming over the surface of the waters, and here and there a solitary pelican was standing in quiet contemplation, on some remote promontory or isolated rock

THE RIFLE SHOT—BLACK SWAN SHOOTING.

One of our party had brought his rifle with him, and was well known as an excellent shot, and although a black swan is of no great value for the table, yet, being a bird very difficult of approach, and, if we have any faith in our early Latin grammar associations, of considerable rarity, it is always considered a prize in Australia, and in this instance we all feit to the rear, whilst our companion made his arrangements for getting a shot at one of the sable band, we fully visible some few hundred yards before us. This was to be effected in the following manner:

The remaining three were to go round the lake, which was not more than two miles in circumference, and make our appearance, if possible, on the opposite and most distant side from the swans, which, upon getting a sight of us, if they did not rise, would, in all probability, approach nearer to our friend, who was lying in ambuscade with his rifle. We succeeded very well in this attempt, and, although we roused many flocks of wild fowl from their previous repose, the swans only glided gracefully onwards in the desired direction. Presently we heard a sharp crack, and the whole flock (save one that lay struggling in the water) rose into the air, with a loud flapping of their broad wings, and disappeared over the tops of the trees.

A native servant of the doctor, who had accompanied us from Melbourne, very soon acted as a retriever, and not without some difficulty (as the swan was not quite dead, and a stroke from his wing would have been dangerous in deep water) brought him to land. He was a full-grown bird, quite as large as any of the white species at home, and very heavy. My friend's bullet had entered the body about the centre of the right wing, completely traversed the chest, and was lodged close to the skin, on the opposite side. The distance of the shot was about one hundred and fifty yards. The lake was too open to admit of our getting any chance at the ducks, so that we contented ourselves with a few specimens of the plover and sandpiper genius, and remounted our horses for the purpose of going to another part of the station, where our host promised us a sight of, and, perhaps, a shot at a kangaroo.

The country, as we ascended the hills, became more dry and scrubby, intermixed here and there with open plains. We had no dogs with us, such as are generally used in hunting this animal. We had drawn our charges of shot and replaced them with ball, and were making our way, in line, as well as we were able, through a thick cover, interspersed with cherry (a sort of cypress) and mimosa trees, when a very large female kangaroo, accompanied by two young ones, bounded away, about twenty yards in advance of us, from behind the blackened and hot trunk of an immense gum tree. The whole family received a volley from us, with apparently very little effect, as they immediately disappeared in the bush, nor could did we see anything more of them.

We saw several more kangaroos at a distance, in the course of the day, during the course of the day, but could not obtain a shot, and returned in the evening to the hospitable mansion of our entertainer with a second couple of snipe, several plover, and the noble black swan I have described above. I need not say that we did ample justice to the tea-table, and roast wild duck, and snipe, which were placed in profusion on the board, to which fare our friend the doctor had made a goodly addition, in the shape of the various delicacies he had brought from Melbourne.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

AROUND THE WORLD.—But little more than ten years since the soft click of the WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE was first heard, making quiet and efficient, it made friends wherever seen. The highest mission ever awarded it from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf. For no other invention has it been necessary to add a second room to uniform and general. Industrial, mechanical, and agricultural societies have awarded it with the highest honors, and hundreds of country and village fairs have been held, at which it was the chief attraction, and certain have been these swards, that the company manufactories have, at times, a general hiatus, caused to exhibit them here in competition with others.

A machine that has been to be seen and honorable. At Paris, in 1855 and 1861; London, 1857; Lisle, and Kensington, 1851; Australia, Melbourne, 1854; and the year at Dublin, Stettin, Cologne and Warsaw; and last, but not least, at Lucerne, in New Zealand, it has won its highest awards. Thus from San Francisco to Auckland it has carried the Lucerne and same and spread the globe.

The company seems it has excited! In civilized lands, women have welcomed it as a deliverer from wearisome bondage. The millions of North America watched its workings with astonishment, whispering "Amazonian witch" (fiercest spirit) the primitive masses of Europe and Asia would not have been more surprised, if the engine had taken to moving its legs and waddled off. The stalwart maidens on classic would gaze with it with drawing tongue of the time when it should clothe them, too, in garments of beauty. In the underground mines it seems destined to bless all the families of the earth.

The success of this invention, marvelous as it may seem, is easily explained. It does not argument what. An enormous expense public opinion was educated to appreciate it. Its company has a set-privilege Britain all of its promises and obligations, and sought, as far as possible, uniformity in the representatives, so that it ever found its highest interests in the interest of its customers, and is meeting its appropriate reward.

The House of BOSANQUET, GIRAUD & CO., Paris, the oldest and most celebrated Jewelry Establishments, one Musical Instrument and Sewing Machine Warehouse, one Jewelry Warehouse, one Gold Pen and Pencil Maker, to be disposed of with dispatch.

THE SHOP TO BE READ UP TO COST.

The Goods are of fashionable styles and most excellent workmanship, and are manufactured in this manner to relieve the proprietors from embarrassment occasioned by a discontinuance. They should be promptly stated, also, that they are mostly of

AMERICAN MANUFACTURE, and therefore, in addition to the goods imported from abroad, besides saving all the immense duties on importation, they will be sold at will be charged for any article on our list, and this sum the purchaser need not pay until he knows what he is to get. This plan accords with the method recently begun to prevail for the disposal of large stocks of Jewelry and similar productions.

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE.

The name of each article offered for sale—as Gold Hunting Watch, Gold Cylinder, Gold Pencil, Pearl Breastpin and Ear Drops, Gold Enameled Ring, Silver-plated Coin Basket, &c., &c.—is put on a card and inclosed in a sealed envelope; these envelopes are then placed in a drawer and mixed. When an order is received, and 25 cents for return postage and charges, one of the envelopes will be taken from the drawer, sent by first mail to the customer, who will see at once what he can get for his dollar. If he is pleased with his fortune, he can forward the money according to the directions on the envelope, or a less sum, if he prefer. If the article forwarded should be unsuited to the purchaser —as for example, a Gold Pen for a Lady and Breastpin to a young man who could not wear them, and had no use for them—he can exchange it for any article from the same department of the catalogue of equal price which may suit better.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers Agents,
No. 167 Broadway, New York.

Announce that all of the above list are sold at one rate, viz: ONE DOLLAR EACH.

In consequence of the depression of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, the entire stock of Valentine Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent to this country, and the articles MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE! Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. have made up-a-gainst for the principal European manufacturers, have resolved upon a Great Gift Appointment,

to be divided according to the following regulations:

Certificates of the various articles will, after envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and when ordered, will be taken out at random, and sent by return mail, thus showing no favoritism. On receipt of the certificate the purchaser will see what the article is, and it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article named, or to purchase from the list. The Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR CERTIFICATE.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding letter, and for the trouble and risk we run in the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when ordering. Persons can have Five Certificates sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.

The Lafayette (Ind.) Daily Courier, March 16, 1865, says: "A better selected, more varied or fashionable assortment of jewelry could not be found in any country than Arrandale & Co. are now offering. Messrs. Arrandale & Co. are men of the strictest integrity and decided as men entirely above the common trickery of trade. Their statements may be implicitly relied upon, both as to the character of their goods and the manner of their business. Ladies especially, in all parts of the country, are realizing handsome profits as agents, and if any of our readers desire to invest a few dollars profitably in the enterprise, they may do so with perfect confidence."

The Boston Daily Evening Traveller.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, &c., &c., by the house Arrandale & Co., No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered for sale at one each. The distributes in a very fairly done—you agree to take certificate, and if it calls for a $100 article you get it cheap, and are not required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article. Arrandale & Co. are worthy more than amount, and may be $50 or $100. An article of jewelry is worth that of inventor a dollar."—Sunday Times, New York City, Feb. 19, 1865.

"Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we have no hesitation in saying they are worthy of public confidence."—New York Scottish American Journal, Feb. 4, 1864.

"We know the firm in question to be very respectable and reliable gentlemen, and we have heard of no failure in the sale of certificates for the Great Gift Distribution of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only in filling her own purse, but in making a handsome profit for others, by whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen by our advertising columns. Certificates can be had at this agency."

—New York Sunday Mercury, Aug. 14, 1865.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., says, Nov. 28, 1864: "One of our subscribers has been made an agent for Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some 30 articles sent across for her agency, to that office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth the full amount of cost to the recipient, and some of them six times."

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as agents will be allowed 10 cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar, the other 10 cents being retained by them on application. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit $15 cents to be retained in cash or postage stamps.

THE GREAT LECTURE ON THE SCIENCE OF WAR.

In vess, therefore, as completely shut off from operations against Richmond, as if he had been in a bottle tightly corked.—[See Gen. Grant's Report, Dec. 6, on Butler.]

The Dyspeptic—The trial and sufferings of the dyspeptic can only be realized by those so unfortunate as to be afflicted with this disease, and yet how many of them suffer and continue to suffer. Why they do this so patiently it is impossible to tell. It can be from ignorance of any certain remedy, or it may be from prejudice against the use of patent medicine. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS has cured thousands of the worst cases of dyspepsia, and each day adds new names to the records of its usefulness. Give the Bitters a trial. For sale by all druggists. A Nation Redeemed.

HISTORY recounts but few events more momentous than that which is recorded in the cold words of an official formula, in another part of this week's paper. We refer to the proclamation of the Secretary of State, announcing the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery for ever in all the States and Territories of the United States. Although anticipated for months, the consummation of this great act, nevertheless, sends a thrill to every heart that beats responsive to the dictates of humanity or the teachings of religion. With it dies a system which our forefathers sought in vain to reconcile with republicanism, and which, while it existed, was a constant source of discord and contention. It contaminated the fountains of public justice, and sought to pervert the teachings of the gospel. Socially it fostered licentiousness, and entailed on the community a hybrid race, with few of the virtues and most of the vices of the white and the black man. It made its supporters overbearing and cruel, inasmuch as it was founded on the assumption that might makes right. It debased labor, repressed literature, and repelled art. It brought vehemence, blustor, passionate, the bludgeon and the bowie-knife into the halls of legislation. It encouraged extravagance, while it discouraged enterprise and mechanical industry. In every view, under every aspect, it was a curse as well as a disgrace. Let any one look over the volumes of our history, or recall the events of the last twenty years, and if there be a page he would wish to cancel, or an incident he would wish to forget, he will find that it was slavery which blotted the page or brought about the event at the recollection of which his cheek burns with shame. The extirpation of this great source of trouble and humiliation has been effected at terrible cost, but the price had to be paid sooner or later. Ten years hence the struggle would have been more severe, and the cost in blood and treasure greater still. This generation might have wished that the latter cup might have passed away, but to it will belong the eternal glory of having consummated an act of such grand moment to humanity, of high example to mankind, that it must stand among the ages as only second in importance to the Advent of our Saviour.

Looking at this great revolution, even those who most strenuously opposed it in it, and contributed most to its success, stand amazed at its magnitude and completeness! Who, except those of most retentive memory could believe that an Amendment of the Constitution now and for ever abolishing slavery, should now be in full and practical effect, when, only a little more than four years ago, the following Amendment to the Constitution was proposed in Congress by Thomas Corwin, and was approved in the House by a vote, 133 to 65; and in the Senate by a vote of 24 to 12:

"ARTICLE 12.—No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."

Mr. Corwin died on the very day the Secretary of State issued his proclamation declaring slavery at an end! Only four years! Truly does the world move, at a pace little contemplated by Mr. Corwin and the "Pacification Committee," when it proposed to entomb a system that Wesley characterized as "the sum of all villainies."

It only remains for us to make this great victory for the human race complete. The spirit of slavery must die with its substance. Then, indeed, may we boast a regenerate nation, and take our proper place at the head of the grand army of human progress.

Constitutional Amendments.

OUR Constitution was framed at a time when we were but three millions of people, with scarcely a fourth of our present territory, before the invention of steamers, railways or electric telegraphs, before the era of those revolutionised the manufactures and commerce of the world, and before the printing press had gained its present control of human thought and action. It was framed in our national childhood, and it is not surprising that it does not altogether meet the requirements of our new and advanced condition, or conform altogether with the political ideas and necessities of this decade. Necessity has several times led us to ignore or technically violate its provisions, as in the purchase of Florida, Louisiana and California. We have several times amended it, and notably within the last few months. But the necessity for further amendment is obvious. It might be inconvenient and impolitic to call a new Convention for the purpose of radically revising it, and we may perhaps secure the changes which experience has shown to be necessary, by the process prescribed by the instrument itself, notwithstanding it is slow and cumbersome. Among the propositions for amendment now before Congress are:

1st. By Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, abolishing electoral colleges, and providing that, in voting for President and Vice-President, the votes shall be cast directly for the persons to fill those offices; also limiting the right of voting to male citizens of the United States, twenty-one years old, who have lived in the State one year and in the district six months; and also empowering Congress to pass laws for registration and the prevention of fraud.

2d. By Mr. Price, of Iowa, to prohibit the assumption by the general Government or of the States of any portion of the rebel debt.

3d. By Mr. Sumner, providing that the basis of representation in the Houses of Congress shall be no longer population, but voters; i. e., members of the House shall be apportioned according to the number of legal voters in each State.

4th. By Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, that, "No tax, duty, or impost shall be laid, nor shall any appropriation of money be made, either by the United States or by any State, for the purpose of paying, either in whole or in part, any debt, contract, or liability whatever, incurred, in aid of, or suffered, by any one or more of the States or parts of States that exceed the purpose of aiding a rebellion against the Constitution and laws of the United States."

This passed the House by a vote of 149 to 3, and will, no doubt, meet the Senate, and receive the requisite assent of three-fourths of the States.

5th. An amendment has been proposed, by striking out the existing Constitutional provision prohibiting duties on exports, so as to permit Congress, in its discretion, to levy a duty on tobacco, cotton, etc., and thus compel nations who now avoid and defeat the taxation to pay a part of the cost of putting it down.

Probably all of these and other amendments of the Constitution will be adopted. We feel more deeply interested in that changing the basis of representation, and thus striking out the prohibition of duties on exports.

"Napoleonic Ideas."

AMONG "Napoleonic Ideas," not speaking now of those of Napoleon the Great, was early that of checking the growth and limiting the power of the United States. This may not be generally known, but it is a fact, that while Napoleon (the Little) was a prisoner in the fortress of Ham, as a punishment for his ridiculous fiasco at Strasburg, he negotiated a contract with a Secretary of the Legation of Nicaragua, in France, a certain Spaniard named Marcoleta, for the construction of a ship canal to Nicaragua ship canal, through that petty republic, to be called "Canal Napoleon de Nicaragua." When the "illustrious prisoner," as his eulogists delight to call him, got out of "durance vile," otherwise Ham, he found refuge in England, where he wrote a pamphlet on his "Canal Napoleon de Nicaragua," which reveals whatever political ideas he then had on the subject, and which we now find practically revamped in this Mexican enterprise. The following extract from the pamphlet in question, and which appears equally in his collected writings, published "regardless of expense," by the Imperial Government, will indicate what his sentiments towards the United States were twenty years ago, and what circumstances have since arisen. Only at that time he had not the fainted notion of ever being able to put them in practice, so he called on Great Britain to do it. The pamphlet was published in London in 1846, and on pages 6 and 7 we read:

"France, England, Holland, Russia, and the United States have a great commercial interest in the establishment of communication between the two oceans, but England has, more than any other power, a political interest in the construction of the Nicaragua. England can see, with pleasure, Central America become a flourishing and powerful state, which will form a counterpoise to that power, by creating in Spanish America a new centre of active enterprise, powerful enough to oppose, with a great feeling of nationality, and to prevent, by backing up the Monroe doctrine, further encroachments of the North. England will witness with pleasure the opening of a route which will enable her to reach her possessions in the Pacific, the progressive decay of which will be thereby stopped. It is a happy coincidence that the political and commercial prosperity of the State of Nicaragua is closely connected with the policy of that nation which has the greatest preponderance on the sea."

It is clear that when Louis Napoleon wrote these lines, he had little notion of ever becoming Emperor of the French. The absurd failures of Boulogne and Strasburg were still fresh in his mind, but he then looked with equal jealousy and hate on the growth and prosperity of the United States, and sought to excite England to do in Central America what he is now himself undertaking to do in Mexico. The wretched old Orleanist, Lamartine, fairly expounded his policy and the motives underlying it, in the article from which we last week quoted certain passages. How England undertook to follow his suggestions, and how abjectly she failed, let the history of the defunct Mosquito Kingdom, of the seizure of San Juan, the robbery of the Island of Tigre, in the bay of Fonseca, the larceny of the Bay Islands, and the other fantastic and futile attempts of Great Britain to build up a real estate dominion in Central America—let these answer!

Great Britain was wise enough to discern in time the folly of her conduct, but the hero of the London and Strasburg mad mobs now imperil his loosely-fitting crown, and endanger his dynasty, by attempting to reverse the decrees of Heaven, and turn back the globe in its orbit. "Americas for Americans, and sacred to republican institutions," is an irrevocable decree of Heaven. Deus vult!—It is the will of God! and neither Great Britain or France can reverse it.

THE outrages of Spain on Chile have elicited, as we have already had occasion to notice, very strong expressions of disapprobation from Great Britain, which, however, ultimately lose much of their value and force from the universal conviction that they have been called out by a pure spirit of rivalry in the export of "shoddy" to the pounds per ton. The Saturday Review is hardly pressed to find a way to condemn Spain, without exposing itself and Strasburg mad mobs now imperil his loosely-fitting crown, and endanger his dynasty, by attempting to reverse the decrees of Heaven, and turn back the globe in its orbit. "Americas for Americans, and sacred to republican institutions," is an irrevocable decree of Heaven. Deus vult!—It is the will of God! and neither Great Britain or France can reverse it.

The Saturday Review is hardly pressed to find a way to condemn Spain, without exposing itself and Strasburg mad mobs now imperil his loosely-fitting crown, and endanger his dynasty, by attempting to reverse the decrees of Heaven, and turn back the globe in its orbit. "Americas for Americans, and sacred to republican institutions," is an irrevocable decree of Heaven. Deus vult!—It is the will of God! and neither Great Britain or France can reverse it. says:

"It would be bad enough that France or the United States should find the profits of a small and unsatisfying power; but who is Spain, that she should threaten and insult a people who have established a republican conquest? Ingenious bondholders already speculate on the chance that the Spanish Government refuses to pay a few thousand pounds to Spain, some fine morning, and then never home naught, with sound justice, raise the market value of Spanish Stock and Debt."

It would like to have the United States interfere. —A tacit confession that whatever she may do, Great Britain will do nothing but talk—but fears that the United States, having no commercial interest involved (only 3 per cent. of Chilean trade being in American hands), could only interfere on the basis of the Monroe doctrine, which is "desirable that Englishmen should not sanction under any provocation." It is also conscious that the demands of Spain are not more exorbitant than have often often made by Great Britain on weak powers, as for instance in the notorious Don Pacifico affair, the latest requisition on the petty Central American States. After all, however, it comforts itself with the hope, rather than the expectation, that the United States will do something, for sufficient enough and soon enough, if the American Secretary of State, in any degree, reflected the sentiments, feelings or principles of the American people. Unfortunately he does not, and there is no hope of American aid for Chile, while Mr. Seward is Secretary of State and Andrew Johnson the power of the Government. We copy the paragraphs from the Review wherein it seeks comfort, and indirectly consoles itself with the prospect of some copper again, as follows:

"With forfeited power, and with largely increased claims to the deference of foreign States, the American Government is now in a position to assume and to restore Spanish dominion on the continent. The occupation of San Domingo in accordance with the wishes of northern, like the French expedition to Mexico, would, in the United States, be regarded as only natural; but the blockade of the Chilean ports is less opportunely timed, and it is, unfortunately, not improbable that it may cause a serious misunderstanding. The Government of the United States would not be justified in a vexatious enterprise, but in a war with Spain it would at any time have the right to occupy as acquisition which has long been coveted by at least one section of American politicians. A disbanded army of veterans would be gratified by the conquest of Cuba, and by the emancipation of slaves; and it would not be difficult to convince the American people that the exclusion of Spain from Cuba would be a fitting result of the retaliation for vexatious interference in Chile, and the best security against the repetition of similar attempts."

THE House of Representatives has pledged itself, by a vote of 144 to 6, to co-operative action with the Secretary of the Treasury, in his policy of contracting the currency and resuming specie payments. This pledge, proposed by Mr. Alley, of Mass., is as follows:

"Resolved, That the House cordially concurs in the views of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the necessity of early resuming the currency, with a view to as early a resumption of specie payments as the business interests of the country will permit; and we hereby pledge co-operative action to that end as speedily as possible."

MR. DOOLITTLE has introduced a bill into the Senate to regulate the relations of jurors and to writs of error in certain cases, which provides that no person shall be held incompetent to serve as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter in question founded upon public rumor, statements of public journals, or the common history of the times, provided he be otherwise competent, and it appear, to the satisfaction of the court, that, notwithstanding such opinion, he can and will act impartially. The exclusion of jurors from sitting in cases of greatest moment, because they have formed an opinion on those cases, has rests to be an abuse. With the present sources of information, hardly any case can come up in which reading, intelligent men have not reached some sort of conclusion. That, however, does not prevent them from deciding impartially on evidence. As it is, juries are almost necessarily made up of men who parjure themselves, in order to decide on a case, for a purpose, or of ignorant louts, who ought never to be entrusted with any responsibility involving intelligence or sound judgment.

"A MARITIME CONGRESS" is proposed in the English newspapers, because it is of "paramount importance that another great war should not break out before we have a clear notion as to what we can ask as belligerents, or what we ought to do as neutrals." Are you there, old Truepenny? Phaeton Alabamas are more terrible to British apprehensions, just now, than were ever Flying Dutchmen to the disordered fancy of the sailor. We want no Maritime Congress. We have offered to settle with Great Britain, as we had the right and as it ought to do, the whole question of international law on the matter, but our offer was repelled. Now we shall wait. We can afford to do so.

THERE is something of impiety, if not of blasphemy, in the manner in which many of our clergymen, in the Divine, have like to be called, seek to "improve" current events. Only a few weeks ago, while the trials of British ordnance were going on, to use a "divine" from Dr. Cumming discovered in the shill and talent which are now being brought to bear on the construction of the engines of war, the fulfilment of the passage of the Apocalypse which says, after the pouring out of the sixth vial, "And I saw three unclean spirits, like frogs, come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." The three kinds of gun (viz: Armstrong, Whitworth, Lancaster, and Blakeley's, who must be the devils who gave their spirits to these thundering frogs. What does Dr. Cumming make of Parrott, Dahlgren, and Rodman? Are they not also devils with frogs of their own? And are there six frogs? Are there American as well as British frogs? Or, is Dr. Cumming simply an impious fool?

WE should like to know what, precisely the functions and duties, but more especially the responsibilities of the "law officers" of the British Crown? As the matter stands, it seems that the responsibility of the British Government and its ministers are all concentrated in the "law officers." An international difficulty arises, a discussion ensues, the British Cabinet overwhelmed by argument, driven into a corner, and called upon to accept a conclusion both right and logical, although runs counter to their own reason, and declares the matter settled, with a "whereas the law officers of the crown have decided so and so," and the case is closed for redress, it appears, must cease and be abandoned when the specter of the "law officers of the crown" rises in the way. Then, and then only, a "bogey" or "bugaboo," before whom mankind are to be appalled—the great oracle to whose mysterious utterances, omne ignotum pro magno knows, nations are to bow instinctively, and without reply, if not with trembling and fear. If Lord Russell thinks that the claims of the United States are to be set aside, or that we are going to accept his refusal for redress, on his simple assertion that the "law officers of the crown have determined to decide on them after a certain fashion; if, in international affairs, we are called on to deal with an unrecognized power, for the convenient body, let it stand out, and let the world see what it is made of, and what degree of importance is to be attached to its decisions. If not, as there is never reason to suppose any convenient attachment to the foreign office, a mark behind which a beaten foreign minister may hide his defeat, and which may be pointed to himself and his country, let us know that. The London Saturday Review tells us that the "Alabama" and other British piratical cruisers got no redress in their cases the "law officers of the crown had decided that no illegality or reasonable suspicion of illegality had been made out against them." It appears then that there is a British court, with no defined, no recognized international characters which questions of law and decides on international questions, and that all foreign nations are bound to accept its decisions without appeal, holding themselves to the accepted organ of the British Government, in the person of its foreign minister! This may be and is a convenient arrangement for Great Britain, but we doubt if it will be accepted by other nations.

MR. JOHN VAN BUREN may not, perhaps, be regarded as the very highest political authority in the land, but here is his opinion on the matter of exercising civil rights on the emancipated slave, extracted from his speech made in Albany just before the State election:

"I think the negroes ought to be permitted to settle in the counties of the Southern States; and, while I am not prepared to say a State that does not allow them to vote is not republican in the sense or representative it is—I am prepared to say, a State that does not permit them to hold office is not republican in the sense with President Johnson's requirements preliminary to their introduction into the Congress of the United States."

THE habit or instinct of meteors to distinguish themselves by a grand promenade or display, on the 12th of the 12th of November, apparently was illustrated, as usual, this year. Observations at the Royal Observatory of Greenwich, England, since that between midnight and four in the morning no less than 229 displayed themselves. At the last hour named the moon was shining brightly, and the meteors were appearing at the rate of 250 an hour. It is calculated that for each meteor recorded at least two appeared. Of these observed, 197 were blue, 24 white, 20 bluish white, 4 yellow and 4 red; a few were rose-colored, and 1 was green. The blue meteors till lit. were 43 per cent. of the whole number; in the next hour the per-centage was 66, between 3 and 4 it was 85, and afterwards 72 per cent. Four of the electors were equal in brightness to Jupiter, two twice as bright as Sirius, and 138 equal to or brighter than the first magnitude stars. Meteors with trains observed numbered 16 in the first hour, 54 in the second hour, 37 in the third, 38 in the fourth and 27 in the last hour of observation, making 172 meteors with trains, leaving about 100 without trains. On the evening of the 13th day a watch was kept up at the observatory from the hour of six p.m. till midnight, with the exception of a short interval between half-past seven and eight o'clock, and two meteors only were observed during this time. From the circumstance of so few meteors being visible both before and after the calculated time, it would seem that this epoch is determined with a good deal of precision.

PROCLAMATION.

W. H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States.

To All Whom these Presents May Come, Greeting:

Know ye, that, whereas, the Congress of the United States, on the 1st of February last, passed a resolution, which is in the words following, namely:

A resolution submitting to the L gislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States:

Resolved, by the Senate and Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both houses concurring, that the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIII.

SEC. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

And, whereas, it appears from official documents on file in this department that the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed as aforesaid, has been ratified by the Legislatures of the States of Illinois, Rhode Island, Michigan, Maryland, New York, West Virginia, Maine, Kansas, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Missouri, Nevada, Indiana, Louisiana, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Vermont, Tennessee, Arkansas, Connecticut, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Alabama, North Carolina and Georgia, in all twenty-seven States;

And whereas, the whole number of States in the United States is thirty-six;

And whereas, the before specially named States, whose Legislatures have ratified the said proposed amendment, constitute three-fourths of the whole number of States in the United States;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United State s, by virtue and in pursuance of the second section of the act of Congress approved the 20th of April, 1818, entitled "An Act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States and for other purposes," do hereby certify that the amendment aforesaid has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caus-d the seal of the Department of State to be affixed. Done at the City of Washington, this 18th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand of the Independence of the United States of America the 90th. WM. H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

TOWN GOSSIP.

BEFORE this paper reaches the public Christmas will have passed down the vale of Time, and the New Year Day, fraught with all its pleasant memories and happy surroundings, will be upon us.

We remember when the good old Dutch custom, which came from our ancestors, even before the days of Peter Stuyvesant, of calling upon all friends, and even more acquaintance, on New Year's Day, was only followed in New York City; but now, we are happy to say, it is spreading through all the land, and town and country alike join in one hearty greeting and renewal of old friendships and bonds of old friendship.

Fashion has in former years, and even now attempts to set its face against the system of New Year calls, but Fashion, in this case, is invariably voted wrong, and the old play goes on gathering strength every year, and serving as a kind of landmark for the rising generation and something for the aged to dwell on. It is an allowed despotism—a day on which absolution is easily granted by everybody, when the remission of debts is taken into consideration. The grand struggle is for supremacy, and the world seems to mark its progress by number of calls. Each beau to make the greatest number. The young ladies treat those best who have the most friends, and the old are not slighted or left out in the list by just dropping in with Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Timkins, Mr. Watkins or Mr. Simkins, to say nothing of a host of the crowd. The young gentlemen desires to make the call as short as possible, and, as a once quence, whenever his purse affords a week in advance. It will run somewhat in this wise:

"Ah! Smith. How d'ye do? Beautiful day, isn't it? Wish you a Happy New Year. No, can't sit down, positively! Must only stay one minute and a quarter. Have to make only one more call, and here it's almost five o'clock. Good-bye! Thank you. Thank you! Oh, I'm glad you glass. Wouldn't do it for anybody else in the world but you. Happy New Year to you, Miss Smith. Hope I'll call you by some other name next year. Ah! but Good-bye!"

And Mr. Brown bows himself into the street, jumps into the carriage, and is rattled away to the 1856 call, congratulating himself that he did the list within the prescribed time; while Miss Smith, before his footsteps have ceased upon the threshold, is going through the same performance with Jones or Robinson, a routine that is jollily kept up till after midnight, when counting time comes, and the upshot of the day, in the shape of various pencilled lists, are counted up and each visitor awarded her proper credit. As between Brown, Jones and Robinson, they are supposed to get home—sometimes they do—but are never supposed to be able to tell how they "do."

And thus passes the New Year Day.

One of the chief excitements of the past two weeks has been Fenianism and its internal dissensions. We never were of those who believed that any good could ever be achieved by this organization, but we did not go to that lies near to the hearts of many of our Irish fellow-citizens, we sorrow that trouble should have arisen among them that will kill the whole affair in the bud, are they have a chance to test its real fallacy. We believe in the principle of allowing agitators to bring their mooted ideas into operation at once, and letting them live or die by the test. The Fenians have been an organization in this country for years, but not until within a few months have they had the handling of any but small amounts of money. As soon, therefore, as the command of large sums came to them—and it was the apple of discord. Patriots are not above a love of filthy lucre, and each of them wanted the handling or disposal of the funds. The result is that them were not disposed to yield, and those who had them not tried to get them, and the split was the consequence. Out of this have grown manifestos and pronunciamentos and general fulminations, and more paper has been spoiled than, if sold at 10 cents per pound, would have subsidized the Fenian Senate and created he-a-deen for the emolument. To crown all, the Fenian organization in Ireland, we give this extract from a Dublin paper, of a misguided man who covets the fate of Emmett and Fitzgerald:

The trial of O'Leary, the Fenian, terminated on the 6th inst., with a verdict of "guilty." The prisoner addressed the court and denied that he was a traitor. He said that he owed no allegiance to the Queen of England, no obedience to British laws. He was not, he said, surprised at the verdict, for as Government officials had safely packed the bench had no difficulty in obtaining a verdict from a jury. When he was called upon for such slight evidence, there would be no difficulty in procuring all the verdicts they liked to come. He declared he had been morally assassinated, and pointed to one of the crown prosecutors present as one of "their miserable men." Dante had placed traitors in the ninth circle of hell, but he did not define what a traitor to be a man who betrayed his king, his country, his friends and his benefactors. As to him, he felt he was not his country, and he was no traitor. With respect to the shooting of the policeman, the destruction of property, that was the necessary consequence of all revolutions, and as it was not his act, the prosecution was disturbed the country were not rebels, but agitators. Hampden and Elliott were traitors, and Fitzhenry and Norbury were loyal men.

The judge sentenced the prisoner to 20 years penal servitude.

As a reasonable bill of prosecution is necessary for the trial of witness, so to be more productive of crime than any that has gone before. The difficulty of obtaining witnesses to the facts of the murder, owing to the fear of the high price of all necessaries of life the next. Men and women will not risk the chance of starving to be hanged, and petty larceny will be greater than the law can take cognizance of. The fact that the jury have to take down the records of the police, and are daily increasing, in spite of all that police can do, is a proof that the people see is in the increased exertion of the wealthy and charitable in alleviating the distress, and thereby put a stop to the dishonesty through want, but who, by small relief to keep the spark of life in the body, will still starve from their infirmity. We know that professional moralists will condemn our creed, but it is the creed of "do as we let go unarrayed."

We now could understand why it is that the position of conductor on our city cars was so much sought. The pay is very small, but then it is for only 12 hours' labor per day, Sundays included; but we have somewhat of an unreckoning in this matter, in the declaration of a prominent city railroad officer, who declares that in one week in the month the conductors were detected and dismissed by one company in the week. The conductor's business is defective in every kind to suit those financial absolutions, but chiefly in the two-cent fare system, which is the bane of contact with the men themselves. These Delilahs make a business of trying to cajole the conductor, will still more to keep in their integrity. We know that professional moralists will condemn our creed, but it is the creed of "do as we let go unarrayed."

On the line of Broadway we have noticed, within the last few weeks, a new style of dodger-bilked individuals, who were an attempt to imitate the "Broadway Messenger Corps." They are, for the most part, were rather a scallawag race, but not until the cold snap we have our fingers nipped have exposed them. During the very coldest of these past few days, the genius got a new idea, and that was to station themselves along Broadway in their flannel sacks, or something like it, and to solicit contributions for the support of the passers-by with an alien of humanity about him. We will whether the company will be successful in getting these poor men, cannot give them something in the shape of an overcoat or shawl with which to keep in warmth and take away shivering and blue noses? Gentlemen of the company, please think of this.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The foreign trade of Boston this year will amount to nearly $60,000,000 of imports, reckoned in United States currency, and $30,000,000 of exports. Its new East India trade, three being 15 ships on the way to that port.

—Mr. McCullough's estimate of the cotton to come out is 750,000 bales. The English firm of Neil & Bros. are to ship 100,000 bales. The consumption of cotton to the war was over 2,000,000 bales, and for the past year 800,000.

—Gov. Jenkins, of Georgia, was inaugurated on the 18th inst. The new Governor is a conservative, loyal, patriotic and hopeful. He pays a tribute to the noble conduct of the soldiers, and declares that instead of receiving the fullest civil protection, and considers that their being disfranchised is a violation of solemn faith and kind treatment, is indispensable to the prosperity of the State.

—The Missouri Legislature has passed a bill allowing prisoners to be discharged when three-fourths of the time for which they were sentenced has expired, provided they conform strictly for that time to all the rules of the prison. The Governor has the unrestricted appointment all those sentenced for life, if at the end of 15 years they shall seem worthy of pardon.

—It is said that the Buena Vista Vineyard, in Sonoma County, California, is the largest in the world. It contains 1,400 acres, and has made 1,000,000 gallons previous to 1865, and 700,000 planted or to be planted in two years. Eighty acres are under irrigation and will grow 80,000 bottles of sparkling wine and 12,000 gallons of brandy. The latter is the most profitable business, and doubts that number during the vintage. There are 200 hands employed, and boarded and lodged.

—John Taylor writes from Prince George County, Virginia, under date of the 18th inst., that the negro places all over Virginia empty and ready for northern men of every kind and calling. Mechanics, merchants, artisans and tradespeople of every kind and description. All that northern people have to do is to come down to make money for a market-gardener, a wheelwright and blacksmith, or any place.

—A Maine paper says that a colony of fifty families, principally from that State, is to embark for Palestine in the early part of January. They reside at Jaffa, the ancient Joppa, building lots having been purchased, and all the way will be transported. A grand movement is to consolidate the great and long slumbering resources of that once favored land.

—It proves by the confession of the murderer Corbett, recently convicted of murdering Mrs. Snow, in Chicago, that three men are now under ten years sentence in the State of Illinois, under circumstances of crime for which they had nothing whatever to do. They were convicted on circumstantial evidence, and will be pardoned at once.

—The Richmond Times laments that the fine old Virginia gentleman, who carried gold-headed canes and were the pride of society, are rapidly dying off. It says the unusual mortality is the effect of new regime, brandy during the war instead of good old liquors, and the want of the old-time social habits.

—The Virginia (Nev.) Union of a late date, says: "On Friday evening last, a blue Lucy Wallis arrived in this city, with a full freight for White & Cunningham, six days from Shingle Springs. The lady herself drove six spanking horses over the Sierras, and landed her freight in safety at its destination in about three days quicker than is usual for teams to make the trip."

—Arthur Savoy, who was sent to prison for killing John F. Marlowe, at Boston, and died a few days afterwards, is reported to have been insane, and that he have made good his escape after his body was given up to his friends. The Boston Traveller says that he is "sulked" and buried in our form.

—Mr. Beecher, in a recent publication on the Kennebeck, remarked to a lady that scripture was excellent to live by, but not to die by. "Yes," said the lady, who had been an attentive listener, "but some gentlemen die on principle who don't live on it, you know nothing about." The bachelor turned pale, and was astonished at silence.

—D. S. Warren, mail-carrier from Iowa City to Washington, was frozen to death—a few nights since on the Plains. He was 75 years of age, was 75 years of age, and his horse being fast in a mudhole, and the night being dark from a snowstorm, the man and his horse both perished.

—The wreck of the historical vessel associated with the seizure of Mason and Slidell, has not long survived the unfortunate war. At last accounts she was at the Isle of Dogs, where she was to be broken up. Her timbers are to be used for the use of her passengers, w o went to the dogs some time ago.

—A man in Providence, R. I., asked the city authorities for $200, for injuries received through the city's neglect. It was refused. The man sued the city for $5,000, and was awarded $4,000.

—President Johnson has positively declined to allow the Government to pay for the workmen's necessary repair shop, after they working hours, and it has been positively ordered by the President.

—The average weekly receipts of the messengers attached to the "Soldiers' Home Corps," in Boston, for the month of July, was $18; that city gave them a benefit on Saturday.

—A woman in New Bedford, Mass., lately gave birth to a baby weighing 15½ lbs.

—A negro jury was empanelled at Colbin, Macon county, Alabama, on the 4th instant. A suit for assault and battery was brought before Squire Bullinger, in which the parties were colored citizens. A jury was summoned, composed entirely of colored men, who, after hearing the evidence on the charge of the court, assessed the fine of $21, to be paid or replevened, and the case was dismissed at the request of the justice.

—Some cotton speculations are thus noticed by the Boston Journal: "A party in this city purchased 100 bales of cotton in Mobile in August last—$10,000 in all—costing $8,000. Within a year ensuing, this lot was sold at a profit of 100 per cent, thereby yielding a profit $22,000. Party number two held it for another rise, and sold the same lot to-day at 60 cents a pound, realizing a profit of $20,000. Party number three held on while, and sold to-day to the one who has been invited to keep it until within a short time, when the career of the 100 bale s came to an end with 40 cents."

—The farmers in the Catskill mountain regions are complaining that the bears, said to be unusually numerous this year, are killing large numbers of sheep.

—A young lady in Chesterfield, Morgan county, was severely injured by the accidental explosion of a gun in the hands of her lover, whom she was kissing good-by.

—A disgusted newspaper correspondent in Georgia gives his opinion of a town: "Waynesborough isn't a town, it's a village, and I don't see why anybody should desire to live here; and a forced residence here is a punishment equal to being made to live on a desert island."

—A Boston paper gravely announces that the election inspectors in that city "coincided in the view" that the votes of a certain ward in a mixed state for two must be irundated. They were thrown out after much deliberation.

—The New Orleans paper publishes a letter from Gen. Beauregard, in which he states, that at one time he thought that Louisiana would preserve entire neutrality expressed by President Johnson towards the Southern States, and that Governor Wells was a traitor.

—Last week an ocelot, or tiger-cat, was shot and killed in the cane-brakes, near Bayou Teche, which had taken refuge in a tree. The animal had escaped from a menagerie, and, being now in winter quarters at Connersville, in that State.

—Benjamin Phinney, a wealthy farmer at Rockport, Ill., was murdered to death with steel-knuckles, by his fifth wife, a pretty girl whom he married six weeks ago.

—For a row cutter at New London, Conn., seized four cords of wood last week, which was the property of a British brig was trying to smuggle into that town.

Foreign.—An attempt is to be made to connect England by tel-graph with America via Sweden and Russia. The contract has been signed, and the work to be finished in three years.

—A Paris correspondent gives the last bon mot of the French capital: "Two old friends grilled Comtesse Augustine Brohmon. The young artist, chatting to a friend, said: 'Do you know that Augustine is dying?' 'People must be mad, for it exhausts life great deal,' replied Emilie A—, 'look at my father, who has been dying these twenty years, and is dying so severely.'" "Ah!" said Augustine, "but if he had not succeed, he would have died long ago."

—The project of a tunnel through the Alps, between Switzerland and Italy appears likely to be soon realized. Well-informed persons affirm that in a few months the works will be in full activity on both sides of the mountain. The experience gained at Mont Cenis will be turned to account, and there is a hope that the two parts will meet in the middle of the tunnel in the short period of each other.

—In 1861 the population of the City of Mexico was 200,000. Travelers used to living in large cities—and there are but few of them—will be surprised to learn that there are 220,000 inhabitants in Mexico now.

—A handsome monument has been erected to Mr. Thackeray, in Westminster Abbey, was uncovered on the 15th inst. The monument is the work of Marochetti. Baron Marochetti, upon a base of red serpentine, surmounted by a medallion of white bears the bust Thackeray, which is simple record of the name, and of the dates of his birth and death. The monument is placed in the north aisle against a wall column in the south transept, behind the statue of Addison.

—A singular incident is mentioned in connection with the death of M. Dupin, late Procureur-General of the Imperial Court, who died yesterday. He was a religious of his state, but under a strange hallucination. He spoke of himself as the "late person." M. Dupin is very ill, M. Dupin is about to die," and a few moments before he breathed his last he asked for water, which was brought to him. When he had emptied the glass he said, "Now I am dead, for I am always so thirsty."

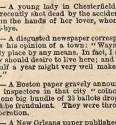
—A despatch from Toulon, France, announces the arrival there of the ship-of-war Perdrix, from Lumeau, on the coast of Cyprus, where she was commanded with great difficulty in taking on board the celebrated and magnificent statue of the Greek goddess of the temple of Venus, built by the Phonicians. This work of art weighs 13 tons, and its removal was hitherto considered impossible.

—The Lowncoe (England) Iron Company now regularly employ three large canalboats going around an out-district, every morning, to collect their workmen, who are brought to their "drapping in" at liquor shops on the way, whereby they formerly lost a great deal of time and money.

—A man named McDonald—a clerk, aged 37 years —has been sentenced in London to seven years penal servitude for having three wives, and for treating them all with the grossest neglect, leaving them at times without food.

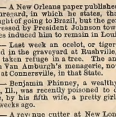
—The trial of the mural-rer Forward, who killed his wife and three children, was to have begun at Maidstone, England, on the 16th of December. He has been employed for weeks back in preparing a large number of crazy letters, addressed to people of high rank in England.

—The most extensive brewery in the world is at Dublin, Ireland. It employs 300 men. It turns out annually 150,000 barrels of beer per day. Every man is allowed a quart per day. The brewery was started in 1780.



—The latest novelties of Paris fashions are jewelry made in the ancient Egyptian and Carthaginian style, and necklaces and bracelets made on ballet dresses and crinoline.

—Queen Victoria expects to spend part of next summer in Upper Austria, at a place called Walsee, on the Danube. The Duke of Saxe Coburg possesses an estate, which he has recently visited.



—It is stated that the butchers in England are working up their stock of meat as rapidly as possible, as the price of good beef, consequent upon the cattle plague.

—The Sultan has issued an Imperial Rescript that is forbidden by his physicians to smoke, he is distributing his snuff-boxes among his friends.

—Among the tombs in the burial-ground of the Carthusian Order in a sum of two hundred pounds a year, left in trust "to burn heretics."

The accompanying engravings illustrate our remarks in a late article on "Horses and Pavements." Our readers will recognize in one the smooth, flat and treacherous surface of the Russ pavement. The other represents the mode adopted in the Strand, London, where by tilting narrow stones, the pavement is, o. 4 were, firmly tied together, while a rough surface is obtained. By splitting the pressed Russ pavement, and relaying it in this manner, its objectionable features would be removed.

WATT'S SANCTUM.—In the house which he lived in, at Birkinhill, about two miles from the centre of Birmingham, and which is the property of his great grandson of the name, he study his, through the good taste of his great-aunt, has left the room just as it was at the great man's death. It is a small, one-windowed garret, at the top of the house, with a cord dangling, filled with models, and piles of objects of every kind on tables, and the bed-room on the shelves, with many jars and packets, carefully labelled in his handwriting. He appears to have been overawed, at the time of his death, with his machine for copying busts and bas-reliefs as there is a large musician for this purpose by the side of it, and about the room are busts of himself and various casts, upon which he was trying experiments. Such an invention has, as is well known, been since perfected, and rendered extremely useful in the multiplication of statuettes from the antique. The stove contains the ashes of the fires at which he, perhaps, warmed his hands, as the wicked the prayers, and made experiments, and there is the little sand-bath on the top, and a tin shovel, all still precisely as they were left.

SINGULAR DUEL.—Two worthies, who had quarrelled, and who had been vowing vengeance on the one another, were supposed to meet accidentally in a public house in Pullneytown, where they mutually determined to settle up old scores, mine host volunteering to act as second to both. The next morning, the fist, was of course the only one that had occurred to them; but when the time came for the fight to begin and another to his pun, suggested that their quarrel was not one which could be fought out with the ordinary implements. Would they allow him to select the weapons for them? Both were willing, and Boniface left both the worthies. "Well, gentlemen," said mine host, when he had got the weapons ready, "the rules of the prize ring shall be, not pistols, but soda-water bottles." A broad hall-way was selected for the combat, and the fight began in downright earnest, each firing away his corks as fast as he could draw the cork from the bottle, when that such had stood a dozen rounds from his opponent they were declared even, and shook hands over the result of the operations having changed their wrath to laughter loud and long, they shook hands and departed, not foes, but friends.

WE REGRET that in giving the fine portrait of Mr. Frederick Douglass in No. 5 of this paper, we regret, that we omitted giving credit for the beautiful photograph from which it was taken, to Mr. Rice Bowly, corner of 10th street and Broadway. We feel this acknowledgment due to Mr. Bowly, because Mr. Bowly, who deservedly holds the position of the first photographer in the country.

JEROME HOPKINS'S CONCERTS.—The afternoon monthly concerts of this able pianist increase in popularity. The last concert, which was given on the 20th, attracted a crowd of fashionable fair ones, and Hopkins was in the highest spirits in every part. Mr. Hopkins was frequently encored.

TASTING FISH.—A little girl, residing near Fulton market, was lately observed to be eating some of the fish, by throwing crumbs of bread, cracker, etc., into the water. The people called her attention to the fact. The little girl walks out on a plank, stationed a few feet from the dock, and when a fish she reaches the end of the plank, the fish may be seen darting rapidly towards their feeding ground. The larger ones, especially, are disposed to drive off the smaller ones, but she keeps river among them by means of a stick with a sewing needle attached to the end of it, and when one picks a morsel he gets a stab, and is off at once.

A NEW YORK Sabbath school teacher asked a young pupil the meaning of "the wages of sin is death." The boy did not know what wages were, and was asked, "What has father got on Saturday night?" "Drunk," was the answer.

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

WHAT romance can any one want more full with incident than that of the life of our President?

Andrew Johnson was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, December 29, 1808. His father died when he was scarcely four years of age, leaving his family very poor. The child finally became the inmate of the almshouse of Wake county, North Carolina, where he remained until he was ten years old; he was then apprenticed to a tailor in Raleigh, and thus labored for seven years. He had never attended school, but he evinced the greatest desire to acquire knowledge, and spent much of his leisure time in study. A gentleman of the place was in the habit of visiting the shop and reading, while the apprentices and journeymen were at work. The selections were from a collection of speeches of British statesmen, and young Johnson at once took great delight in them. He thought it would be the consummation of his happiness if he could read and comprehend these speeches. He procured an alphabet, and without an instructor, attempted to learn to read. When at a loss to know a letter, he received assistance from the journeymen, and at length mastered his task. After this he borrowed the book, and the owner gave him some instruction in the art of reading. It was not long before he became a good reader, and after having spent ten or twelve hours in his daily labor, he would give two or three hours to mental improvement. On the completion of his apprenticeship in 1824, he removed to Laurens Court House, South Carolina, where he worked as a journeyman. Here he won the affections of a young lady, who promised to have him provided he could get her mother's consent. One Sunday Andy plucked up courage and spoke to the mother on the subject nearest his heart. To his dismay, the old lady began to abuse him without mercy, and said:

"You trifling, worthless vagabond, do you suppose I am going to let my daughter marry a wandering journeyman tailor? I know what you want; you are too lazy to work, and you are after my property."

The old lady was the owner of three negroes. The poor tailor gave up his suit in despair.

In May, 1826, he returned to Raleigh, where he procured work, and remained until September. Later, he journeyed westward, and engaged in work at Greenville, Tennessee. His mother was entirely dependent upon him for support, and she had accompanied him. After about a year he married, and then went further west, but returned to Greenville and commenced business. He was still ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, and now, under the instruction of his wife, he entered upon the higher branches of study, acquiring a good fund of information. During the day and part of the night he pursued his fatiguing occupation, and at midnight pored over his books with his loving instructress.

In 1828 he was elected to his first office as alderman of the village, and was twice re-elected. He was next elected mayor, and served for three years. In 1835 he was elected to the State Legislature; in 1837 defeated as a candidate for the same position, and in 1839 again elected by a large majority. His political career was early marked by bold and comprehensive views of public affairs. In 1841 he was elected to the Senate. In 1843 he was elected to Congress, receiving by successive re-elections until 1853. During his career in that office he advocated the bill for refunding the fine imposed upon Gen. Jackson at New Orleans in 1815, and the annexation of Texas, the Tariff of 1846, the measures of Mr. Polk's administration, and a homestead bill. In 1853 he was elected Governor of Tennessee, after an exciting canvass, and was re-elected in 1855 after another spirited contest. At the expiration of his second term in 1857, he was elected to the Senate of the United States for the term ending March 4, 1863. He, however, never completed his term. On March 4, 1864, he was confirmed by the Senate of the United States Military Governor of Tennessee, with the rank of Brigadier-General, with all the powers, duties, and functions pertaining to that office, during the pleasure of the President, or until the loyal inhabitants of the State should organize a civil government in accordance with the constitution of the United States. The designation of Gen. Johnson for the position was considered by everybody as eminently proper, both in view of his peculiar fitness for the office and of his great popularity among the loyal people, besides his devotion to his own State. The Governor, by the acceptance of the office, necessarily vacated his position as Senator.

Before the secession of the Cotton States was accomplished, Mr. Johnson made several powerful speeches on the subject, and became the centre of the hot-bloods of the South, which attracted a wide attention both North and South. While passing through Lynchburg, his way to Tennessee to arrest, if possible, the act of secession, a crowd of rowdies entered the car at the depot, and one of them, the editor of the Lynchburg Republican, pulled the nose of the Senator. Knowing the potent power of his tongue in convincing the people of their duty, the secessionists prevented him speaking in Middle and West Tennessee. Most of his old political associates were plotting the overthrow of the Union, but neither promises of power, nor threats of dire vengeance, could move him from his uncompromising loyalty. He was obliged to leave the State, and consequently his family received many indignities.

After his return to the State in 1863, a series of Union meetings were held at different points, which were addressed by Governor Johnson and other prominent Unionists. The guerillas laid various plans for the capture of the Governor, but were defeated by the watchfulness of his friends. Persons returning from the meeting were murdered. On the return of the train with the Governor and party, the bodies of six or seven Union men were found at Murfreesboro. Says a statement:

"Much excitement existed among the town-people, and they unitedly pressed the Governor to remain, as on all sides. Visions of a murderous smash-up were constantly before our eyes. Governor Johnson exhibited no signs of alarm whatever. He conversed as pleasantly and as composedly as he ever did. He had made up his mind to one thing—never to be taken alive by his enemies; and the few devoted friends who were near him shared with him this resolve.

The train reached Nashville in safety at about nine o'clock. At a later hour the same night the guerillas tore up the track, and the next train that went over the road was thrown off. During the siege of Nashville, in the autumn of 1862, Governor Johnson, while viewing an engagement from the cupola of the capitol, made the remark, "I am no military man, but any one who talks of surrendering I will shoot."

Mrs. Washington Barrow, wife of a very rich and prominent secessionist, called on Governor Johnson to know by what right certain claims of hers on the rivers front were infringed upon?

"By the right of conquerors," was the reply.

Some of the secessionists were taking the oath prescribed by the Governor, when one of them approached Col. ——, who had recently subscribed to it, and said:

"Well, Colonel, I hear you've fixed. Is it so?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'll fix one, too."

The man took the oath amid much merriment. Governor Johnson himself retained the usual rigidity of his features at the quaint remark. The following day there occurred between the Governor and a rebel physician:

Dr. Hall—"Governor Johnson, I know you have a grudge against me, and you are now gratifying your revenge."

Governor Johnson—"I have no reason to gratify any resentment I may entertain towards you, no."

Dr. Hall—"Why have you no reason?"

"Governor Johnson—"Because I consider you too contemptible to excite an emotion of resentment in any one."

Dr. Hall jumped to his feet, but the determined demeanor of the Governor overawed him, if he did entertain hostile intentions. Governor Johnson then turned quietly on his heel and left the room.

At this period, Governor Johnson is spoken of as a model of abstemiousness. He never played cards for amusement or gain. He never indulged in drink on any single occasion, to a greater extent than possibly clergyman would at a sacrament; and as for the smaller vices, he was free from them all.

On the 8th of June, 1864, Mr. Johnson was nominated as the candidate of the Republican party for Vice-President of the United States, and elected in the following November. He left Tennessee entirely tranquil, and repaired to Washington, was sworn into office on the 4th of March. By the death of President Lincoln by the hand of the assassin, Mr. Johnson became his successor, and was quietly inaugurated at his rooms at the Kirkwood House, at 11 o'clock, on the morning of the 15th of April. In a short address, he said: "Todd, with an honest advocacy of the great principles of free government have been up." The duties have been mine—the consequences are God's. This has been the foundation of my political creed. I feel that in the end the Government will triumph, and these great principles will be permanently established."

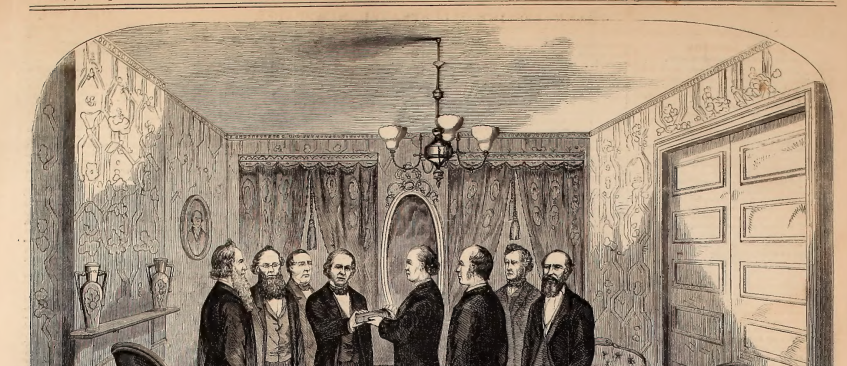
President Johnson is of tall, full person, long and muscular. He has a large round head, with prominent features and marked intellectual characteristics. His eyes are clear, with a steady, unflinching gaze, and both there and his mouth show his bold, resolute nature. The nation has been long looking for a President with Jackonian will, and they are likely to find one in Andrew Johnson. Let them survey the calm, honest face of their new ruler, and they will see the lineaments which most strikingly typify the fearless thinker and the man of true purpose. Obstacles only inspire him with greater determination, and responsibility only strengthens his nerve for the discharge of duty. The child of poverty and obscurity, the victor over ignorance and caste, he will stand proudly as the champion of free constitutional government, and faithful to the high trusts to which destiny has borne him.

EARLY MORNING—FEEDING THE KITTENS.—FROM A PAINTING BY H. KRETZCHMER.

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW

In the son of the Hon. Stephen Longfellow, of Portland, Maine, and was born in that city February 27th, 1807. At fourteen he entered Bowdoin College, and four years later took his degree with high honors. For a few months in 1825, he was a law student in the office of his father, but having been offered a professorship of modern languages in Bowdoin College, with the view of qualifying himself for the post, he passed three years and a half in travelling in France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland and England, and returning to this country in 1829, entered upon the duties of his office. In 1835 Mr. G. Tickner having resigned his professorship of modern languages and belles lettres in Harvard College, Mr. Longfellow was appointed to the vacancy. He then gave up his chair at Bowdoin and again went abroad to become more thoroughly acquainted with the languages and literature of Northern Europe. He passed more than a year in Scandinavia, Germany and Switzerland, and again returned to America in the autumn of 1836, to enter upon his duties at Harvard, where he has since resided, except during a brief visit to Europe in 1842.

While yet an under graduate, Mr. Longfellow wrote many tasteful and highly finished poems for the United States Literary Gazette, and while Professor at Bowdoin College contributed valuable criticisms to the *North American Review*s. In 1833 he published his translation of the fine Spanish poem or Don Jorge Manrique, on the death of his father, together with an introductory essay on Spanish poetry.



In 1835 appeared his "Outre Mer;" in 1839 "Hyperion," and "Voices of the Night." In 1841, Ballads and other Poems; in 1843, Poems on Slavery. From this time Mr. Longfellow worked industriously, and the literary world recognised his labors with the high est honors. In 1855 appeared his "Song of Hiawatha." From which, perhaps, no poem ever elicited more notice or criticism on its first appearance. From that to the present, Mr. Longfellow has gone steadily on, adding to an already high reputation for genius, and has offered for public suffrage. No American poet is so popular and well known, and none have more frequently translated and reprinted in foreign countries.

ANDREW JOHNSON'S INAUGURATION.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN was assassinated on the evening of April 14th, and on the 15th, Andrew Johnson was sworn into the high office of President of the United States.

The ceremony took place at his own rooms at the Kirkwood House, at 10 o'clock in the morning, in the presence of Hon. Salmon P. Chase, Hon. Hugh McCullough, Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Attorney-General Speed, F. P. Blair, sen.; Hon. Montgomery Blai

ANDREW JOHNSON TAKING THE OATH OF OFFICE IN THE SMALL PARLOR OF THE KIRKWOOD HOUSE, WASHINGTON.

Senator Foote, of Vermont; Senator Yates, of Illinois; Senator Ramsay, of Minnesota; Senator Stewart, of Nevada; Senator Hale, of New Hampshire; Gen. Farnsworth, of Illinois.

The oath, in the following words:

"I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

was pronounced by the new President, in a clear, full voice, after which he addressed those present:

"Gentlemen, I must be permitted to say that I have been almost overwhelmed by the announcement of the sad event which has so recently occurred. I feel incompetent to perform duties so important and responsible as those which have been so unexpectedly thrown upon me. As to an indication of any policy which may be presented by me in the administration of the Government, I have to say that that must be left for development as the Administration progresses. The message or declaration must be made by the acts as they transpire. The only assurance that I can now give of the future is by reference to the past. The course which I have taken in the past in connection with this rebellion must be regarded as a guarantee of the future. My past public life, which has been long and laborious, has been founded on I, in good conscience believe, upon a great principle of right, which lies at the basis of all things. The best energies of my life have been spent in endeavoring to establish and perpetuate the principles of a free Government, and I believe that the Government, in passing through its present trials, will settle down upon principles consonant with popular rights, more permanent and enduring than heretofore. I must be permitted to say, if I understand the feelings of my own heart, I have long labored to ameliorate and alleviate the condition of the great mass of the American people. Toil and an honest advocacy of the principles of free Government have been my lot. The duties have been mine—the consequences are God's. This has been the foundation of my political creed. I feel that in the end the Government will triumph, and these great principles will be permanently established. In conclusion, gentlemen, let me say that I want your encouragement and countenance. I shall ask and rely upon you and others in carrying the Government through its present perils. I feel in making this request that it will be heartily responded to by you and all other patriots and lovers of the rights and interests of a free people."

At the conclusion of these remarks a few moments were devoted to conversation, but the terrible event of the past few days hung like a pall over every head, and cast a dark shadow over every face.

Those days have grown into history, and every word, look and action among those who were prominent in them will always be of deep and abiding interest.

In this light we produce them as national pictures, and worthy of careful preservation.

FIRST VISIT OF THE AMBASSADORS TO PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

THE members of the diplomatic corps called upon President Johnson, at his rooms in the Treasury building, on the afternoon of the 30th of April, 1865. Sir Frederic Bruce, the new Minister from England, with his attachés, called a few minutes before the balance arrived, and presented his credentials. He was to have been presented to Mr. Lincoln at the White House the previous Saturday, but the untimely and tragical death of Mr. Lincoln on Friday night prevented his meeting him as had been arranged, and he was this morning introduced to President Johnson. They had a cordial interview for a few moments before the other ambassadors arrived. It was exceedingly cordial and pleasant on both sides.

Soon after the other representatives of the foreign nations made their appearance, and marched through the long hall leading from the State Department thence across the building through the hall leading from the middle entrance on the east side of the building to the Secretary of the Treasury's room, now occupied by the President. They were escorted by Mr. Hunter, acting Secretary of State, bowalking arm in arm with Baron Von Gerolt, Minister from Prussia. The following ambassadors were also present—M. Edouard de Stoeckl, Minister from Russia; Senor Don Tassara, Minister from Spain; Senor Luis Molino, Minister from Costa Rica; Col. W. H. Blanchet, Minister from Denmark; Col. Bertinatti, of Italy; Senor Matias Romero, of Mexico; Baron Rantzau Sugar, of Colombia; Baron de Wilkenski, of Sweden; Baron Wydenbrock, of Austria; T. G. Asta Burnaga, of Chile; M. L. de Geofroy, Charge d'Affaires, from France; Senhor Barbosala, Charge d'Affaires, from Brazil; Mr. Boeing, Charge d'Affaires, from the Hanseatic Republic; Alfred Berghmans, of Belgium, and Mr. Garcia, of Peru. They were mostly attended with their secretaries and other attachés, all arrayed in full court dress, most of them wearing the badge of mourning on their left arm.

The Minister from Portugal, and M. Von Limburg, of the Netherlands, were not present. Probably they did not receive notice of the intended visit.

Baron Von Gerolt read the following formal address of condolence, sympathy and good wishes of the representatives of the foreign governments under the present trying times:

ADDRESS OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS.

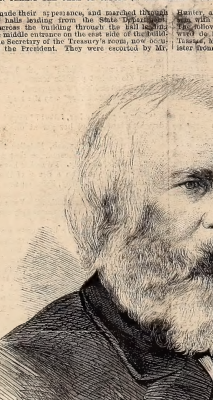
MR. PRESIDENT—The representatives of foreign nations have assembled here to express to your Excellency their feelings at the deplorable events of which they have been witness, to say how sincerely they share the national mourning for the cruel fate of the late President, Abraham Lincoln—and how deeply they sympathize with the government and people of the United States in their great affliction. With equal sincerity we tender to you, Mr. President, our best wishes for the welfare and prosperity of the United States, and for your personal health and happiness. May we be allowed, also, Mr. President, to give utterance, on this occasion, to our sincerest hopes for an early re-establishment of peace in this great country, and for the maintenance of the friendly relations between the government of the United States and the governments which we represent.

REPLY OF THE PRESIDENT.

To which the President replied:

GENTLEMEN OF THE DIPLOMATIC BODY—I heartily thank you, on behalf of the government and people of the United States, for the sympathy which you have so feelingly expressed upon the mournful events to which you refer. The good wishes also which you so kindly offer for the welfare and prosperity of the United States, and for my personal health and happiness, are gratefully received. Your hopes for the early restoration of peace in this country are cordially reciprocated by me. You may be assured that I shall leave nothing undone towards preserving those relations of friendship which now fortunately exist between the United States and all foreign powers.

THE FIRST CABINET MEETING



Under the Present Administration.

THUS most important event in the history of our country, an event which we repeat by a drawing taken on the spot, occurred at 10 o'clock, on the morning of April the 10th, Sunday, at the private office of Secretary McCulloch.

At this meeting there was present President Johnson, Hugh McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury; Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War; Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy; William Dennison, Postmaster-General; J. P. Usher, Secretary o the Interior; and James Speed, Attorney-General.

That the necessity was urgent and the deliberation solemn, is unnecessary to say. It was in the very midst of one of the most terrible of national calamities, and the country from one end to the other had been suddenly thrown into a state of mourning and agitation, from the very height of hope and rejoicing. The death of that great and good man, Abraham Lincoln, by the hand of the assassin, was an event well-calculated to overthrow even the calmest minds, and every man in authority stood upon his guard, for none knew how far the plot extended, or who might be the next victim.

These were the circumstances under which the first Cabinet meeting, under the present Administration, took place.

PROFESSOR HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY FREDRICKS.

THROUGH THE CHURCHYARD RAILS.

BY J. W. WATSON.

WITH timid steps and downcast eyes,
She came beside my knee,
And stifling back a little sob,
My darling spoke to me.
"Papa, I'm very, very sad,
A thought comes in my head,
Suppose your tiny baby girl
Should be some morning dead?"

I caught the little prattling thing
Close to my throbbing breast,
And with my kisses wild and warm,
I hushed her into rest.
"Who taught you, darling, words like these,
To startle all my fear,
Who bade you think so sad a thing,
That Death should be so near?"

"Papa, none bade me think of death.
The thought is all my own,
It came this morning to my head
As we walked out alone.
We walked along the crowded street,
And by the churchyard rail,
And then came whispering in my ear,
This simple little tale.

"It said: look, Maggie, through the bars,
And see how many graves,
They lie in furrows, as the sea
Is furrowed by the waves.
Some rank with grass of many years,
And some are newly made;
The rich, the poor, the old and young,
All side by side are laid.

"I looked and marked the many rows,
As far as I could see,
And oh, Papa, I saw that some
Were shorter far than me.
And then I thought how sad a thing
'Twould be, Papa, for you,
If I should think that I would die
And that my thought came true.

"That on some dreary autumn time,
Perhaps like this to-day.
You walked beside the churchyard rails
And Maggie far away.
Away among the countless graves,
Of every shape and size,
And Papa by the iron bars,
With hot tears in his eyes."

The years have swept above my head,
Since those fond tones I heard,
And here beside the churchyard rail,
I think of every word.
The scalding tears are in my heart,
For Maggie lies within;
Oh, God! this crown you offer us
Is fearful hard to win.

MISS NATALIE'S FRENCH MAID.

MADEMOISELLE NATALIE VAUX sat opposite her father at an exceedingly dainty and well-ordered breakfast table; a frown upon her white forehead, a pout upon her pretty mouth.

At last her dissatisfaction and anger became so evident that her father, by no means a clever person, yet not entirely blind, observed it.

"What is annoying you, Natalie?"

At this question the young lady frowned still more ominously, then burst into a perfect tempest of sobs.

"Fanchon—that hateful—wretch—I won't—have her—another day!"

"My darling Natalie!" and the anxious father dropped his paper and stared at his daughter in a state of perfect bewilderment.

"Has Fanchon been impertinent? Don't cry, dear—we will dismiss her this very instant."

"Yes, father, I hate her."

The sobs became more violent, and the distressed gentleman made a rush at the bell, and rang it with the utmost energy. Then to the servant who answered it:

"Say to Fanchon that Miss Natalie does not require her services any longer, and that she is desired to leave the house immediately. Her luggage can be sent to any direction she may give, but tell her to go now."

If Vaux, père, had not had his face turned from his aggrieved daughter, as he issued this command, he might have been edified, by seeing a bright black eye, entirely innocent of a tear, gazing triumphantly out from behind the lace mouchoir pressed so convulsively to the fair face.

"Thank you, papa," in a grateful but still agitated voice; "that girl was the torment of my life. I haven't—spoken before, because you seemed to like her so much, but her insolence is something too great to be borne. I'm so glad—"

A flush of pleasure made the ruddy English cheeks of Mr. George Vaux still redder, and his voice was as triumphant as that peering eye had been a moment before, as he said:

"Thanks, Natalie, for such a proof of your affection. I did like the girl, but if I had known that she was annoying you she should not have stayed in the house another minute. Why didn't you speak before, child?" Here he paused, then went on hastily, as if a long sought-for chance had presented itself, "I hope you have not forgotten that Mr. Gilbert comes to-night for his answer." Another pause, and an accession of melo-dramatic sternness to the voice. "You know, Natalie, that your future prospects depend upon your decision. If you refuse so good a husband as Mr. Gilbert, it must be for the sake of that vagabond of an artist. And"—with rising indignation—"you needn't think to make me revoke my decision, either. I met the rascal in the street to-day, and told him that if he ever dared to set his foot inside my door again, I would thrash him within an inch of his life. So, do you hear, no hopes in that quarter!"

And having worked himself up into a towering rage, Mr. George Vaux stalked from the room.

It was rather remarkable that all this dictation and anger produced so slight an effect upon a person of Miss Natalie's temper. No sooner had the door closed behind her father than she sprang to her feet, put her handkerchief in her pocket, smiled gaily, hummed a little tune, and danced out of the room by another door.

That night, arrayed in her daintiest fashion, and in the best possible spirits, the young lady astonished her old and almost discouraged lover by murmuring a soft "yes" to his proposal of marriage, instead of the stern "no," he had expected. Her father was equally astonished and delighted, so much so, indeed that he presented her that night with a deed which entitled her to five thousand a year for the remainder of her life—not so much, to be sure, but still enough to keep one, perhaps two, from starving.

From that all was peace between father and daughter, so long at variance, for this marriage had been a mooted question for over six months. The father insisting upon so desirable a match, the daughter rebelling against the ugly face and forty years of her suitor. Perhaps Miss Natalie was not altogether to blame—we should have said responsible—for her dislike to Mr. Gilbert, since to an artistic nature like hers—which had been assiduously cultivated—what could have been more disagreeable than the idea of a lover and a husband, whose eyes were of a pale green, whose nose was always pinched and blue, and whose general appearance suggested the idea of a miserable half-starved chicken standing out in the cold.

In contrast to this visage, so continually thrust upon her notice, Miss Natalie was forced in self-defence to contemplate that of her teacher—a handsome young man of twenty-five. And was she to blame for liking to look at that winsome face? Can you censure her, that as she watched him day by day, as their hands touched, their eyes met, their voices mingled, she grew to love him only as such black-eyed resolute women do love?

You ask if Miss Natalie saw no other men but these two? Most certainly she did. Young, pretty, rich, she moved in the best circles, but among all her admirers she found none so handsome, so noble as the artist, who came twice a week to give her lessons in oil painting. In the course of time Miss Natalie's father grew suspicious, insisted on being present at two or three lessons, watched the two young people with sharp eyes, and drew his own conclusion. The result was that he forbade his daughter to continue her artistic pursuits, for an indefinite length of time, alleging that her health suffered thereby.

With many black looks and many displays of temper, Miss Natalie obeyed, but beyond a certain point her father could not control her. He had forbidden her to take lessons of the artist, Esmond Hillyar, but he could not compel her to be courteous to the millionaire, Isaiah Gilbert. Neither could he prevent chance (?) meetings in the street, at the theatre, in picture galleries, with the same troublesome artist. Neither could he control the United States Mail, which not unfrequently performed the office of carrier pigeon, and conveyed tender epistles backward and forward between the two lovers.

So stood matters on the morning on which our story opens. As we are too fast, we must go back to the previous afternoon. It was precisely five o'clock, and Miss Natalie Vaux, in the most stylish of pony phaetons, rolled through the Park. Among the hundreds of lovely women present that June afternoon, not one was more elegant, more piquant, more admired than this same Natalie. Perhaps the consciousness of this was the cause of the very brilliant idea which suddenly came to the young lady. As the thought became well defined and shapely, she laughed a little gleeful laugh, struck her ponies smartly with the ivory-handled whip, and dashed on like a whirlwind. Just as she reached the open space before the Casino, a gentleman on foot passed her, and bowed deferentially. In an instant the ponies were checked, the equipage stationary. The gentleman turned back and came to the side of the carriage.

"Esmond," said the young lady, hurriedly yet softly, "I have a plan; come closer, dear, and listen; such a capital idea!" and in a few moments the plan, whatever it was, was unfolded, and approved by her handsome listener.

Again the ponies felt the whip, and the phaeton rolled on, out of the park, through street after street, until at last it drew up before the door of her own stately home.

That night as the clock struck one, that very door opened noiselessly, and a slight tall figure, well disguised by the brown cloak enveloping it, stole out, glided down the marble steps, joined another figure, that had been stationary for the last half hour. A few rods further down the street, and the two turning a corner disappeared. An hour afterwards the two figures came back and bade each other a hasty adieu at the foot of the marble steps.

Perhaps the printer, who passed at that instant, hurrying home from the hot and crowded press-room, was mistaken, or, was still dreaming of the story he had just been "setting up." Be this as it may, upon reaching home, he declared to his better half, that "he passed in —th street a man and a woman, who stood at the foot of a flight of white marble steps. This was nothing strange to be sure, but it was strange that as the man turned to go, the woman stretched out hastily a hand, white as snow, and glittering with jewels, saying, tenderly, something about 'to-morrow—bless you, my husband—Fanchon—letter of recommendation—French cap—speak low,'" and still more of the same kind that he could not understand or hear, for the man, seeing that they were watched, suddenly turned and walked away.

Now, my dear reader, we have brought you safely to the opening of the story, even to detailing the events that occurred a few hours before.

To continue. You have already learned that the offending maid has been dismissed, and that Miss Natalie, strange to say, has accepted her old suitor, and is, apparently, in the best of spirits.

The next morning an advertisement appeared in the papers, wherein it was set forth that a French or Swiss maid, highly recommended, was required immediately by a lady who was soon to make the tour of Europe, and wished the said maid to accompany her.

Need we say that the lady was Miss Natalie, and that the tour was to take place immediately after the wedding?

The young advertiser remained at home that morning, and went through the ordeal of receiving and reviewing six Gallic damsels, emulous of the honor of waiting upon "Mademoiselle Vaux."

None met her approval, however, and the next day, as fate would have it, mademoiselle's father declared himself too unwell to go down town, and desired Natalie to receive the applicants in the library, in which retreat he had ensconced himself for the day. There was no help for it, so she yielded with a good grace, and sat beside him for over an hour, reading in a voice suspiciously monotonous. It was evident that she was trying to read her father to sleep.

It was labor thrown away, however, for at the first ring of the bell that sagacious gentleman opened his eyes—which his daughter had fondly imagined to be closed in sleep—coughed, sat up, and observed, in a tone of great self-congratulation:

"How fortunate, Natalie, that I happen to be home. I am a great judge of character, and may prevent you from engaging some swindling girl who would rob you right and left, ahem!"

Miss Natalie was not at all nervous, but as she heard this speech, her face flushed and her hand trembled.

Scarcely had the pompous "ahem!" died upon the air before the library door was opened, and a dapper little figure ushered in— a bourgeoise copy of Mademoiselle Vaux herself.

Notwithstanding all her very evident qualifications, and unexceptionable references, Miss Vaux did not appear to fancy her, and she was dismissed with a wave of the father's diamonded hand. Half an hour elapsed, then came another ring, another applicant was announced, and conducted in.

The advent of this person was greeted, on the part of the father, by an involuntary "What a giantess!" on that of the daughter by a quick drawn breath, and then an approving smile.

Truly, the applicant was not an ordinary looking individual. Very tall, rather stout, but well formed, with dark hair, combed modestly down over her ears, and almost covered by a French peasant's cap; white, even teeth, a brown complexion, and large blue eyes that had a strangely "out of place" look in that dark face. Notwithstanding a certain gaucherie in dress and general appearance, the woman was very handsome, and promised to be still more so when tastefully dressed.

"Do you speak English?" inquired Miss Natalie, in the coolest possible manner, for her nervousness had suddenly disappeared.

"Non, mademoiselle," was the respectful answer.

"How do you like her, father?" questioned the daughter, levelling at her parent one swift and triumphant glance.

"Very much—very much, Natalie; take her, my child. There's character in that face, nobility, decision, sagacity. I'd rather have such a woman around you than a dozen of these silly, chattering magpies. Why, Fanchon was nothing compared to this one."

During this eulogium, both Miss Vaux and the woman kept their eyes perseveringly fixed upon the carpet.

When it was finished, a lively conversation—in French—ensued between future mistress and maid. As a matter of course, its burden must have been on the part of the mistress, at least, an explanation of the duties which were to devolve upon the maid. But Vaux, père, was totally ignorant of the French language, and he soon wearied of a dialogue in which he could not join, and whose subject he could only conjecture.

As may be imagined, it was not long before he intimated this fact to his daughter, thereby bringing the interview to an abrupt termination.

Ma'amselle Alixe—so she gave her name—was sent upstairs, and in a few moments Miss Natalie followed, her black eyes dancing suspiciously.

Time went on. The wedding was to take place in September. The gay Natalie grew suddenly quiet and fond of home. When rallied on the subject, she avowed that she had conceived a great aversion to balls and parties, and found much more happiness in staying soberly in her own domicile. They were all very happy there apparently. The father was all smiles, the daughter growing lovelier day by day, the old lover—though by no means overwhelmed with tenderness by his fiancé—radiant from present and anticipated happiness.

The French Alixe was a great favorite in the house. Imposingly handsome, marvellously silent, always attentive and sweet-tempered, she won the love and respect of both master and servants. As for her young mistress, she seemed perfectly bewitched with her new attendant. Hour after hour the two passed together, apparently well satisfied to be in each other's society. To be sure, the maid rarely spoke, and when she did it was in so low a voice that you had to listen carefully to catch her meaning.

Never was lover more devoted to the service of his beloved than this woman to that of Miss Vaux. The young lady neither moved nor spoke that those piercing eyes were not fixed upon her. Every wish was anticipated, every want gratified. A keen observer might have discovered that at the sound of Miss Natalie's approaching feet, or the lightest murmur of her voice, a sudden flush would make the dark cheek still darker, and cause the blue eyes to ambush themselves in the long, golden lashes.

A strange woman—a woman, about whose simplest action hung a mystery, an oddity, that only caused her to be more prized and admired.

One evening Mr. Vaux made the following observation to his daughter:

"Natalie, my dear, it appears to me—I don't know—very likely I am wrong—but it really strikes me that I have seen Alixe somewhere before. She reminds me of some one. Who can it be? A gentleman, I think."

The young lady opened her eyes to their widest extent, and Alixe herself, who was just leaving the room, cup and saucer in hand, started so violently that the two morsels of china fell from her fingers, and were dashed into a hundred pieces.

"Peste! quel dommage!" murmured the careless girl, coolly picking up the fragments.

The diversion was effectual, and the subject dropped.

But what could have agitated Mademoiselle Alixe?

September had almost arrived—the house was in confusion from morning till night. Dressmakers reigned supreme, milliners became of importance. Miss Natalie was wanted constantly to "try on" this or that garment, and, it is needless to say, looked lovely in all. Shopping was the order of the day, and in most of these expeditions Alixe accompanied her young mistress.

But one incident occurred to mar the general happiness.

Alixe had obtained leave of absence for three days, as she was to go to Europe with Miss Natalie, after her marriage, and naturally had a desire to visit her friends before leaving. On the afternoon of the third day Miss Vaux went shopping, as usual, and returned at six. At eight the bell rang, and a letter was brought upstairs, directed to "Mister Vo."

"Is an answer desired?" inquired the gentleman so named, with an amused smile.

"No, sir; a man brought it, and said I was to give it to you immediate, then walked off, sir, like a steam-engine," and James retreated, greatly pleased with his metaphor.

Mr. Vaux turned the doubtful-looking epistle over and over, with many an expression of wonder, then tore open the envelope, and, extracting a soiled sheet of paper, began the perusal of the forlorn-looking lines written therein.

As he read a frown gathered upon his forehead, and his hands trembled with evident passion. The two who sat opposite, Natalie and her old lover, watched him with amazement—nay, more than that, on the part of the young lady, at least. Astonishment alone could not have driven the rose flush from the soft, dark cheek, or caused the traitorous little heart to beat so swiftly and loudly, that it was a great wonder neither of her companions heard it.

"Girl," thundered the hot-tempered father, as he finished the delectable epistle, "where were you this afternoon?"

The color came back to lip and cheek. Miss Natalie's bright eyes flashed ominously.

"Sir?"

He had gone too far.

"Where were you this afternoon?" in a stern but much modified voice.

"At the —— Gallery."

A look of surprise on the part of her questioner; he had evidently expected a denial.

"Were you alone?"

"I went alone."

"Whom did you meet there?"

"Alixe."

"Are you telling me the truth?"

Miss Natalie's face grew as pale as her father's was red. She turned to her bewildered suitor with an abruptness that almost terrified him out of his few remaining wits.

"Ring the bell," she said, imperiously.

A servant came.

"Has Alixe arrived?"

"No, miss; but we expect her every moment."

"Send her here the very instant she comes."

"Yes, miss."

The servant closed the door, Miss Natalie seated herself by the window, and a dead silence ensued. Five, ten, fifteen, twenty minutes passed, then a step in the hall, and the door was opened hastily. In the doorway stood Mademoiselle Alixe, calm yet defiant.

Mis Natalie did not move, she only said:

"Question her."

Mr. Vaux by this time had grown a little awkward and confused.

"When did you see your mistress last?"

An almost imperceptible sneer flitted over the handsome face of Mademoiselle Alixe.

"This afternoon, sir, in the —— Gallery."

How rapidly her English had improved!

"You may go."

One swift glance at the motionless form and scornful face of Miss Vaux, and the waiting-maid left the room.

"Are you satified, sir?"

The father winced beneath the bitter tongue of the daughter, and his only answer was a step towards self-defence. He handed her the letter.

"Mister Vo," it began, "I am a friend of yours, and don't like to see you cheated by your daughter, Nataly. I know that she is engaged to be married to Mr. Isaiah Gilbert, but it isn't for love of him I tell you what I'm goin' to—it's for your sake. Perhaps you haven't forgotten that six months ago your daughter was very sweet to Mr. Esmond Hillyar, a young man that gave her painting lessons, and was in love with her. I suppose you heard, too, that when it was said Miss Vaux was goin' to marry rich old Gilbert, Mr. Hillyar went to England. Well, perhaps he did, I don't know anything about it; but I do know that this very afternoon your daughter was sitting in one of the little side-rooms of the ——— Gallery, with a gentleman beside her, who had his arm around her waist, and who kissed her a dozen times. They thought they were alone, for almost everybody had gone, but I was lookin' at 'em, and if that fellow wasn't your boy, the painter, then I haven't got eyes. He looked very different, somehow, but I know it was him, and I think it my duty to write and let you know.

A FRIEND."

Miss Natalie tossed the letter from her with a scornful laugh.

"I saw them this afternoon, father," she said, "but I spoke to no one, saw no one that I knew, except Alice. About a week ago I went to the gallery with some friends, and left a bracelet, I told Alice, and to-day she went to inquire about it. So you see there was nothing very astonishing in the fact of our meeting."

Mr. Vanx had grown excessively red during this speech. At its conclusion he left his seat and walked to the window.

"Natalie," he said, and he spoke as if every word choked him, "forgive me; you know that I love you very much, but I couldn't bear the idea of your cheating me under my very nose, and you to be married in two weeks. I couldn't bear to think that you intended to force me to become the wife of one I hated? And all because one was rich and the other was not, and your preferlonge may become the wife of a poor artist. Natalie, I had need of the money; if you had, it would have been some excuse for you, but you wanted to make me an instrument of your own gloratication; you wanted to be the millionaire, Isaiah Gilbert, that your son-in-law, even if your daughter's heart was broken in making him so."

The fish are somewhere, and the day following had been fixed for the marriage. Father and child were as good friends, apparently, as ever. The ceremony was to take place at ten o'clock, and the steamer which was to bear them to Europe sailed at twelve. Night came. Natalie, thoroughly exhausted by the day's excitement and fatigue, stepped into her father's room to say good-night.

"Is everything ready, Natalie?"

"Yes, all, my baggage is all on board. Everything is arranged. Good-night, papa."

Perhaps Miss Natalie had expected some tender little word, some caress, on this the last night she should ever spend beneath his roof, but she lingered, as if loth to go, a faint color fluttering into her cheeks, a certain agitation in her manner; but Mr. Vanx was not a sentimental man, and only answered her with an absent

"You will be worth two millions, my dear, and when Natalie Gilbert you will be a wife, for Mr. Gilbert's health is not very good," and the father laughed coolly at the supposition.

An unutterable expression of disgust and indignation swept over Natalie Vanx's face, as, without making any reply to this observation, she turned and left the room.

Morning dawned, bright and beautiful. The ceremony was to take place at ten, and at eight the bride had not emerged from her room. Sundry knocks and calls had been of no avail in rousing either mistress or maid, and as the doors of their respective apartments were locked, it was impossible to ascertain the cause of this strange non-appearance.

At the clock struck eight, the anxious father himself went to the door, and pounded with his own heavy fist upon the door leading to his daughter's room.

No answer.

"Bring an axe," cried the agitated man, a cold perspiration breaking out upon his forehead.

The axe was brought, and in five minutes the door, though bolted and barred, was forced open, and the anxious crowd of servants, headed by their master, burst in.

Oh, what a peaceful room! so quiet, so dainty, so empty!

Through the curtains of rose-colored silk the September sunshine poured, in sheets of misty gold; a faint perfume was in the air; in the window blossomed the perfect grandeur of roses and mosses, and over all was the charm, the traces of a woman's ownership and recent presence.

Certainly recent, for although the room was then vacant, the dress Miss Natalie had worn the previous evening dropped over a chair, and upon another was Miss Natalie Alice's unvarying black silk gown.

This was not all. Upon the inlaid toilet table reposed a white object. It was a letter, directed to "Isaiah George Vanx." With a trembling hand and pale lips, the foiled and almost distracted man tore open the envelope and read:

DEAR PAPA:—When you read this letter I shall be many miles out at sea with my husband, Edmond Hilyar. I have been Mrs. Hilyar since last June, and even if that had not been the case I could never have married the man whom you have selected for me. I offer no excuses for what I am about to do—what I have done. I consider myself justified in the sight of heaven. I take with me only my simplest clothes, and the small legacy left me by my aunt. It will be enough to support us in Rome—for we are going there. I take Alice with me, yet I have no French maid, Alice and I husband are one. Adieu, my father. Your loving daughter,

NATALIE HILLYAR.

A steamer had sailed for France at four o'clock that morning, and in it Mrs. Hillyar and her French maid—that is, her husband—had taken passage.

It is not quite as dangerous to be snapped at by a dog as by a gun.

HERE'S A HEALTH TO KING CHRISTMAS.

HERE'S a health to King Christmas, to merry King Christmas,
With his mistletoe, holly and bay;
His fun-dimpled old face, his good homely old ways,
His jests and his laughter gay.

Light-hearted let's meet him, and right joyously greet him,
And all loyally treat him whilst here;
Old Decembers, like old, ought to remember,
Comes round but once in a year.

For the songs that he sings us, the friends that he brings us,
The blessings we find in his stay,
And his shower of provisions and fun;
With sparkle light and merry lob's toast him as sherry,
Let's drink to him every one.

Here's a health to King Christmas, to merry King Christmas,
With his mistletoe, holly and bay;
His fun-dimpled old face, his good homely old ways,
His jests and his laughter gay.

THE RESURRECTIONISTS.

In the present day, a man may have reasonable hope that his body will be allowed to rest quietly in its appointed grave. But it was not so recently; and there is no writer of fiction in England more than middle-aged can recall the days when the Resurgam Clubs, as they styled themselves, or Body-snatchers and Resurrectionists, as they were called by the outer world, carried on a flourishing trade.

In the medical practice of surgery, anatomy was little practised, and the corpses of many lives and other criminals offered a sufficient supply for the "dry" lectures which the students who held that examination of the dead human body was absolutely necessary; but towards the close of the last century the progress of surgical science on the Continent, and the discoveries of John Hunter in England, caused a new light to dawn, attention more nearly to be study of nature; hence arose an increased demand for subjects, and the resurrectionists came forward to meet it.

The graveyards in the more outlying parts of the cities were their usual haunts, and from these, in spite of very precautions, they carried off many hundreds. In many instances, the gravediggers, sextons, and persons employed to take care of the churchyards, were in the pay of the body-snatchers, and would leave their gates unbolted, and turn their backs when the deed was to be accomplished.

So little confidence did the public have in these official guardians, that in many churches, for a time after the deceased person were sent to keep watch, night after night, by the side of the grave, until such time had elapsed as to render the body useless for the purposes of the surgeon. Even their kindly vigilance was not to be baffled. A very short period of inattention was sufficient for the purposes of the robbers, as it was that they could remove a body from a grave of the ordinary depth in a very few minutes. They never removed the whole of the earth from the grave, but simply dug a hole at the head of the coffin, until it was broken to view. Then a rope was passed round under between the lid and the coffin, they prized up the lid, which generally broke it away from the upper part by the weight of earth. The body was then drawn out, stripped of its clothing, and carried away in a sack. The empty sepulchre were made perfect by replacing every article of clothing in the grave, and merely carried off the unburied corpse. The reason for this was, that body-snatching was by the law merely a misdemeanor; but taking the clothing was felony, and would have subjected them to transportation. They commonly carried also to replace everything in the grave in the same order as they had found it.

The friends of the departed were in the habit of putting private marks on the grave, to discover whether it had been disturbed, such as a piece of glass, a piece of tile, or an oyster-shell. These were replaced with the most rigorous exactitude; and consequently many a mourning attended the spot, after the grave had been continued the remains of his beloved one, while in reality it was only watched by an empty coffin. Springe-pins were occasionally set in the churchyards, but without avail. During the daytime, the resurrectionists sent a man with a cart of hay from one of their depots, for the purpose of observing where the pegs were fixed to mark out which graves would be attacked; therefore, when night came, they easily found the spot, and having their way cautiously along the wires, they removed the loaded sweeps, and carried off their avocation in security.

The surgeons were not without their share of crime in these affairs, as they frequently had to take the bodies from the houses of the resurrectionists to the hospital. In one occasion, a student, with a couple of assistants, carefully packed in a hamper, in a hackney-coach, from one hospital to another. To his surprise and alarm, the coach stopped in a narrow street, where the coachman descended from his box, and putting his face at the window, said in a hoarse voice, and fearful oath:

"Sir, my fare to the place you want to go to is £10, unless you wish to be put down here."

The terrified student at once paid the money.

The leading men among the resurrectionists were acted upon a system of organization, and give them selves no small sire. At the commencement of a certain session, one Ali-play, a noted character, presented himself before the house-surgeon of a large anonymous establishment on conversation, he said:

"Well, doctor, this season I must have $100 down, and $46 for every 'thing' I bring you."

("Thing" was the cant phrase for "body.")

"Now, my friend," said the surgeon, "its downright extortion. I shall employ some one else."

"Very well, sir, you can employ whom you like; but when you won't be able to get a body at all."

The event proved that Murphy was right. The new men were robbed of their prey, detected, one after another exposed and detected by the police; so the doctors, in despair, were obliged to employ Mr. Murphy.

Here is a genuine extract from a diary kept by one of this gentleman's trade-mily:

"Dec. 24, 1811—At 12 midnight, party went to get three small. Came back, and got two large at 1 o'clock. Came home, to settled at Ben's. Each man's share, $48 75. Friday 27—Went to look out. Came home; met Ben and Dan. Went to Harp's; got one larger took it to Jack's Rest; came home. Went out with us, getting drunk. Saturday 28, 4 A. M.—Whole party to Guy's and St. Thomas's crib; got six; took them to St. Thomas's; packed up three for ——; took one over to Jack's."

The two kings of this unhallowed craft—for it was in fact a few hands—were the above-mentioned Murphy and one Patrick. The following story is told of the latter, as a specimen of his untiring activity.

He was returning from a country village, with nothing particular to do, when he heard that a female body, supposed to be that of a pauper from the workhouse, had been found in the canal, and was then lying in the stable of an adjoining public-house. Having always an eye to business, he entered the public-house, and called for a glass of ale, and, entering into conversation with the stable-boy, who remarked:

"Curious job, master, that 'ere woman dead body."

"Why not?" asked Mr. Patrick.

"Because, last time, the parish officer put me next to nothing for my trouble."

Patrick chuckled inwardly, and apparently out of pure observer of mere humanity, agreed with the lads of a sensible door. He presently left, and went straight up to the city. He returned the same night with a trusty friend and a hackney-coach.

Next morning, a jury of 12 honest fellows was impanelled by the coroner. After hearing a certain amount of evidence, the coroner said:

"Now, then, gentlemen, if you please, we will view the body."

The boy led the way into the stable; a cloth which covered something on the floor was removed, and disclosed to the eyes of the astonished jury a truss of straw!

On another occasion, a footman, who was acquainted with Patrick, informed him that his master was dead, and that he thought something could be done with the body. Patrick offered to have anything to do with the affair, until the coffin was screwed down, which was accordingly done, and the footman left the funeral being ordered for the following day. The footman and Patrick then removed the body, placed it in the garden, and filled the coffin with bricks. Patrick actually attended the funeral, and afterwards stated that he could not help grinning when the clergymen alluded to "our dear departed brother."

A number of persons who died in the most opulent circumstances, left their bodies to Guy's and other hospitals, and Mr. Patrick took advantage of the circumstance to procure a number of disguises, by which means he obtained the bodies of the deceased. He was aided in this scheme by one Cochman, a stout, broad-shouldered fellow, who had formerly been one of those subjects in one of the hospitals. This system had been carried on at the workhouse with great success for some time, when Murphy, Patrick, and Cochman were discharged, it is said, through jealousy at Patrick's prosperity. By plying Cochman with liquor, he learned all the mode of the operation from him, and advised him to inform the beadle of guardians of the affair, as they would reward him handsomely. Cochman accordingly turned informer, and Patrick was arrested by the police, but eventually discharged for want of sufficient evidence.

On another occasion, Murphy and Patrick were working amicably together as partners in a most lucrative undertaking. There was a private burial-ground belonging to two old women, who resided in a cottage hard by. They employed one Winckett as gravedigger and sexton. Murphy and Patrick concluded an arrangement with this man, by which Winckett was to forward all subjects to them. Winckett, however, was a married man, with children, and Hollis, got scent of the affair, and calling one day upon Winckett, threatened to expose him unless he gave them a share of the job. Winckett made no reply, but crossing immediately over to a public-house which was full of laborers, shouted out to the assembled company:

"Do you see those two men? They are bodysnatchers, and have come to bribe me to let them rob the graveyard."

The laborers, excited to fury by these words, rushed on Murphy and Patrick, and would have killed them. The baffled scoundrels, in revenge, went before a magistrate, and made him that if he examined the burial-ground at Holywell, he would find the grave with numerous instances deposited of their dead. The magistrate agreed to do so, and the graves in question were opened, and found tenantless. The mob were enraged beyond measure; they gutted Winckett's house, and beat his wife and children almost to death through a barrow-pond, and seeing Winckett, attempted to lynch him. Winckett, however, escaped, and was suffocated when he was rescued by the constables. Even the two aged proprietors-s, who were totally innocent of the whole affair, had their windows broken.

FEEDING THE KITTENS—EARLY MORNING.

FOR the perpetuation of art, of whatever country, we owe their work a fine engraving from that beautiful picture by H. Leutemann, which is one of the most popular genre painters of the age.

The scene is in Southern Germany, and the costume that of a young peasant girl. The time is early morn, and the young litter of pets are taking a frugal breakfast under the supervision of their mistress; while the old ancient tabby, with a satisfied smirk, sits in the background and is evidently a most interested, thoroughly understanding that she is at the bottom of it all.

These reminders of art are well worthy preservation in any portfolio, and we are glad to notice a public taste than all the lectures and art schools of the world.

THE TOMB OF BENJAMIN AND DEBORAH FRANKLIN.

THE ground on which the tomb of Benjamin and Deborah Franklin, his beloved wife, belongs to Christ Church, of the city of Philadelphia. The church is situated in 5th, between Market and Arch streets. The property on which the church stands was bought by them in 1695, just the years after the city was founded, and when the population was about 2,000 souls. The first interment's were made upon this church ground, but as the city and population increased, it was found necessary to secure a larger lot, and one was got in 1719, on the corner of 5th and Arch streets, then the suburbs of the city, and in this ground lie the Franklin remains.

For a long time this ground was the principal burying-place of the city, and there all the principal Philadelphia families can point to the graves of their ancestors. The earliest date shown upon the tombstones is 1731, but burials are known to have been made there during the year it was first bought.

Many distinguished Americans, and others of great interest, whose tombs are pointed out to visitors, there are deposited in this ground the remains of several prominent individuals of the past. The records of the church disclose the fact that Peyton Randolph, the first President of Congress, was buried here on the 34th of October, 1775; and again, that Francis Hopkinson, one of the most distinguished patriots of the Revolution, was interred here on the 11th of May, 1791: not a careful search affords no clue to their resting-place, as no tablets mark their graves. In the church building, also, there have been several interments without a memorial. The records of the year 1793 state that Brigadier-General Forbes died on the 10th of March at that time, and was buried in Christ Church, but there is no stone marking the resting.

The Pennsylvania Gazette, of the 15th of March, 1729, furnishes the following information of Benjamin Franklin, died of a tedious illness, John Forbes, Esq., in the 49th year of his age, son to ——— Forbes, Esq., of Pitfichie, in the Shire of Fife, in Scotland, Baronet, Secretary, Colonel of the 17th Regiment of foot, and Commander of His Majesty's forces in the Southern Provinces of North America. Yesterday he was interred in the chancel of Christ Church, in this city."

The locality of Franklin's tomb is in a retired part of the grounds, and the grave, until recently, could only be visited with difficulty; but in the year 1858 a portion of the wall was torn to be taken down, and a gate opening substituted, so that a view of the grave can now readily be obtained without entering the grounds. Resting on Arch street, the grave is on the north-west corner of the ground, parallel with Arch street.

The plain appearance of the tomb must strike every one as unworthy of the memory of Franklin, over whose remains one would naturally look for an imposing monument commemorative of his worth; but such, as seen here, is such as was contemplated by him before his death, and has positively ordered in his will. The following is an extract from the codicil of his will, dated 23d June, 1785, the year before his death: "I wish to be buried by the side of my wife, if it may be, and that a marble stone, to be made by Chambers, six feet long, four feet broad, plain, with a small moulding round the upper edge, and this inscription:

BENJAMIN
and
DEBORAH FRANKLIN.

1790."

This is the style of setting on the tomb now, but it is very much decked or beaten by the storm.

The tomb of the church state that Deborah Franklin was buried here 23d December, 1774, and Benjamin Franklin on the 17th of April, 1790. The headstone on the left hand side, at the head of the tomb, has the following inscription:

FRANCIS F. son of
BENJAMIN and DEBORAH FRANKLIN,
Departed this life November 14th, 1736,
Aged 4 years 1 month and 4 days.

That on the right side:

In Memory of
J. H. S.
Son of B. & D. FRANKLIN, who departed this life
September 12th, 1794,
Aged 21 years.

The tomb adjoining that of Franklin, to the left, is that of

RICHARD,
SARAH
and
HALL.
1811.

The statements given above are mostly taken from the vestry records.

A MONKEY MASS MEETING.—We mounted the horses, and were soon in a spot inhabited by the sowars. There were not so many as had been represented to us, but they were by no means few when I come to state that there could not have been fewer than eight thousand, and more likely of an enormous size. I could scarcely have believed that there were so many monkeys in the world if I had not visited Benares, and heard of the tribes at Gibraltar. The sticks, which were blown together to a fire, made a very large stack of wood.

"What do think?" my friend said to one of the Bahaders, for since his appointment he had never heard the last of the feeding of apes.

"It is a festival of theirs, Sahib," was the reply. "Once a year they all assemble, and go to Burhwa Hedgepur, and other places, so do those monkeys come to the Nyd Ghaut."

"And how long do they stay?"

"Two days," I went on then, they go away to their homes in different parts of the country; then, attend to their business for the rest of the year, when they again and to festival, and so on, six, to the end of all time. Do you see that boy? The monkey there, with two smaller ones on either side of him?"

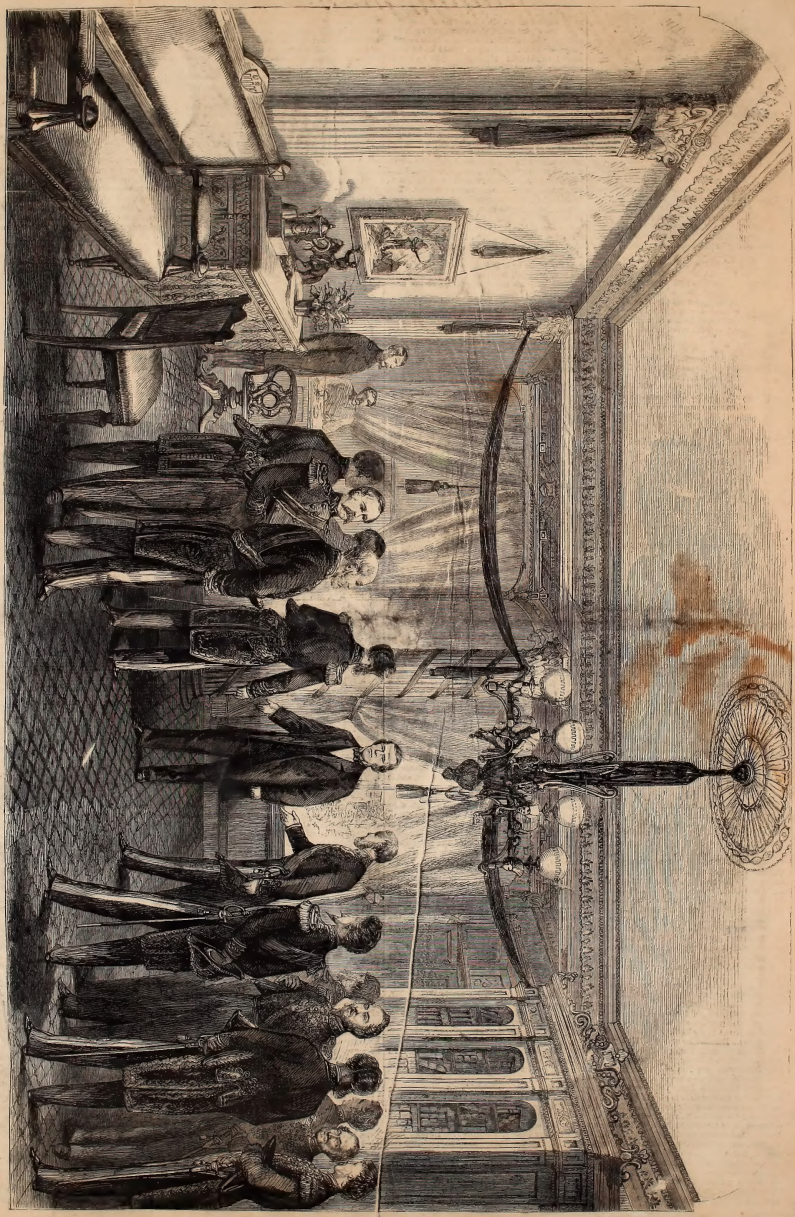
"Yes."

"Well, sir, that is a very old monkey. His age is more than twenty years. I think, I saw him when I was years ago. He was then full-grown. His native place is Burhwa Hedgepur. He is the property of the Rajah Khan, near Meerut. The smaller ones are his sons, sir, and the boy has had them here before. I think you see he is showing them all about the place, like a very good father."

A SISTER.—He who has never known a sister's kind ministrations, nor felt his heart warming beneath her endearing smile and love-beaming eye, has missed a blessing indeed. It is to her he resorts in the fountains of pure feeling flow as his bosom no ex cites the sympathy of another creature in the world. Not in the sterner attributes of manhood.

Whether in the hour of joy or sorrow, kind and affectionate sisters," I once heard a lady of much observation and experience say,

"And why do you think so?" said I.



"Because of the great devotedness of all the tenderer and more refined feelings of the heart, which is so apparent in her every action, in every word."

A sister's influence is felt, even in manhood's later years, when the world has grown cold, and all is chilling contact with the world, will warm and thrill with the recollection of the gentle voice of a sister mingling with the continuous and glad melodies or his sister's voice. And how powerful is her influence. What is it that all false philosophy has reckoned into expediency, and even weep at the gentle influences which moved him in his earlier years.

WHAT ARE WOMEN TO DO?—Men are educated to become merchants, lawyers, doctors, and to look for no one themselves, save men have that chasticity of manhood that will not stoop to accept the badge of favor. If Jones can't make money by trying cases before the bar, Jones can at least be a carpenter, or invent a machine for the inculcation of perpetual motion. He is never at a loss. But all this, which is regularly taught to men, women have to find out for themselves. Nevertheless, they can find it out, if they only have the chance. The pressure is so great that the escape-valve must spring open. Women cannot comfortably be allowed to starve in a civilized country. They may be worked by the thousand, by hundreds, by tens—are idle, if they will, and no legal courts will interfere. But starving is quite an unthinkable thing. It wouldn't sound well in the papers

NONE LOVE ME BEST.

BY R. V. R.

NONE love me best;
I do not fill the need
For earthly love of one fond human heart.
Like some poor waif,
Some spray of ocean weed,
Upon the waves of life I drift apart;
Not all alone—yet lonely and unblest,
Because unsatisfied—none love me best.

None love me best;
Of all whom I can claim,
Friends—kindred—large in number; not a few Kindred alike
In tender thought and name,
In blood and ancestral memories hoards and true,
But each hath denser ties; I cannot rest,
Calm and contented, where none love me best.

None love me best;
There is no heart that turns
To mine, as to the polestar's faithful spark;
Not one for whom
My love a beacon burns,
Brighter for her when all around is dark,
Not one to seek her refuge on my breast,
As dearest comforter—none love me best.

None love me best;
When in my coffin laid,
I know that tender tears will wet my face,
All cold and white,
And tender words be said,
But none will weep to fill my vacant place;
Not one will mourn, with true heart grief opprest,
Her nearest, dearest, gone—none love me best.

None love me best:
Oh! hush the plaint, poor heart,
And prize to others from thy own large store
(Thus shalt thou share
In love's diviner part),
The less they give to thee, still more and more;
To give than to receive is far more blest,
Be glad, poor heart, because none love thee best.

Bound to the Wheel.

CHAPTER XLVIII.—IN POSSESSION.

Sleuth, then, is at last lord of all. The murder has not been unproductive; and, wonderful as it may be to relate, Sleuth, secure in mind, on looking back at all the attending circumstances that his own behavior must have been a miracle of foresight, skill and courage.

He wished Anthony had behaved differently. Foolish fellow! to throw away ten thousand pounds like that! and to reject, at the same time, his (Sleuth's) friendship! What a fatal blindness to his own interest! However, he had chosen his part. Since a beggar he was determined to be, Sleuth had nothing more to say or think on the subject. Let him beg and starve!

And then he began to revel once more in his wondrous luck. He didn't venture, certainly, to make Providence directly responsible for encouraging his acts, but he almost habitually lived in a kind of unconscious faith that he was cared for in some providential way; else how could he, as he asked himself, have got through such trials to such a success?

The week following Anthony's departure, which occurred on a Friday, was spent in a remarkable way, and may be thrown thus into a kind of diary:

Saturday.—A day of recovery from the wine, from Anthony's ingratitude, from the mystery resisting watchfulness, from Esau's abuse, from the disrespectful behavior of the servants, from Phillis's exposure of his sole, and from the general silence or unpleasant commentaries of the World as to his elevation, all ending with a determination to go to church next day, and begin the life of a very respectable member of society.

Sunday.—A day of gentle dreams—gentle agitation at the church in church, the observed of all observers; gentle hopes, gentle satisfaction with the look of things generally on going to bed at night.

Monday.—A day of something like enjoyment at last. He is never tired of exploring the different rooms and nooks, the stores, the cellars, any more than he grows weary of studying Anthony's bankbook. Anthony's plans for a new house, and Anthony's various Claudius—copies of which he finds torn up, while exploring the recesses of Anthony's waste paper basket.

Tuesday.—Eureka! he may cry. He has found it. He has found that which all men seek, and one in a million possibly gets—happiness. Fortune embarrasses. He sees everything through a delicious atmosphere—a magic atmosphere, that at one out things he doesn't like, and magnifies every one of his treasures to gigantic bulk. Rich as he is, he knows he is going to be richer, for he has a cunning instinct that "never deceives" him, and which whispers now he will get rid of Phillis, marry Clarissa, and become the doctor's heir. And that involves, very naturally, and as a mere matter of course, that he shall be also a magistrate, and take precedence in due time among his brother magistrates—perhaps, also, become M. P. Really, on the whole, a good day's work!

Wednesday.—A little reaction, which he doesn't care to acknowledge, but which makes him very glad when the solitude of the day is over—that he is no longer obliged to expect calls from the neighbor gentry, and can get to bed, and cause them all in his heart, if he likes. But no. Richard Sleuth couldn't do that. He respects his "superiors" too much, even though he may have to lick the dust off their shoes for a little while to propitiate them. And where would he be good sense if he did not? Isn't he going to be one of the "superiors?"

Thursday.—One prolonged yawn in every possible attitude and place.

Friday.—A very sensible idea worked out—that bides doesn't consist exclusively of dreaming you are in blue, in paint at least, of setting to work to obtain what you most fancy. Accordingly, Richard Sleuth, with a sigh, comes to the conclusion that even when you have a rental of two and sixty thousand pounds, he may be very miserable unless he can add something else—companions, society, friends, a wife, a recognized and respected position in men's eyes. And he determines to begin anew on Monday morning. Yes, he will take up his career of life in a practical manner, and take no more notice of the bliss of dreams.

And how did he begin?

Having noticed that Mrs. Milton said nothing about going away, a fear crossed his heart that she might have accepted of her purpose—say, that she might be in Phillis's confidence, and was waiting, with full knowledge and malice aforethought, as to his coming promises, and the duty of making him fulfil them.

An embarrassing position to most men; for had he not asked her to stay? and to stay in so earnest a manner that he was bound to receive it as a compliment should she yield! Well, he thought, it might be difficult to other people, but not at all difficult to him (Sleuth). He had worked his notions well out, during Sunday, on his second visit to church, and while the minister, on whose face Sleuth's eyes were wont to fall vacantly, was thinking he had never had a more attentive listener. And from that time, let us observe by the way, the clergyman's style of address of ceremonial calling, and before the week was over—the second week—people dropped in, or left their cards; and Sleuth was delighted. But he did not care to discover they were mostly persons in his own social predicament.

"Good morning, Mrs. Milton," he said, placing a gilt armchair for her in the drawing-room, whither he had gone after sending for her. "Charming day, and we are so cozy, aren't we?" sit down. And your pretty god-daughter, how is she? Take a glass of wine and a bit of cake?"

The housekeeper stared at him—stared at the cake and wine—frowned, and said nothing; for she didn't understand this altogether novel style of address from Mr. Sleuth to her. Also she didn't like it, and went on, only with increased zest.

"You have been a very faithful servant—perhaps I ought rather to say faithful friend—of my uncle. I am his heir, and I want to show you and Phillis—I mustn't forget Phillis—all the kindness I think you should have shown. So, now, what can I do for you? Tell me. Do you want more servants? Have them. I don't mind the expense. Carriage—anything. I don't see why you and Phillis shouldn't come in here of an evening, and sit with me, as you used to do with my cousin. It must be dull for Phillis, very dull. You must let me treat you both to the play occasionally, and have supper afterwards—very nice plan that—at an hotel, and, of course, all at my expense. Glad you approve. Now, that's very beautiful. I feel a kind of responsibility on me for her welfare. It's her birthday to-morrow. See; here are the cards and presents I mean to give her. What? It wouldn't be right for me to do it, you know, as they are valuable."

The housekeeper's speech was uttered in a kind of low, unctuous, affectionate tone, that increased most naturally the housekeeper's surprise, and it was some time before she could collect in her mind what to do. Meantime, her ins seemed to double inwards with the stern pressure to which they were subjected, and her outs to grow larger. What, however, he appeared to have said all he had to say, she got up with a kind of resentful fluttering dignity, declared very coldly that she would go to Phillis, and let him know what they both thought, before they went to bed, of he "great kindness."

Away she went to the room where Phillis was sitting, with her lap full of needlework, bit which she had not touched for the moment she heard of her godmother's summons.

How anxiously she waited and watched for the time to return! and how her self-pity, to behave the dark, stormy face that re-entered the room.

"There! put up your work. It's the tea you'll have to-night, I promise you. Now look at me! Where's my keys? Have them strapdowned out for the trunks there. Gibbs!" she called to the servant in the hall, "put down the keys, undow, and he came from the stable there to have standing outside.

Phillis took places in the couch to-morrow morning to the Swan with Two Necks, Lad Lane. Mind you book the places beforehand, and pay for them."

Gibbs promised, and went away; and then drs. Milton shut down the window with a great noise, turned, and let loose the full force of her rage on poor Phillis.

"You're a nice, creditable young woman to bring out into the world as I was told you? There! Hod your tongue! Don't talk to me, you hussey! What! nothing less than diamonds will content you, eh, my lady? Pretty notice you'll pay for 'em! For shame! for shame! I didn't think anybody belonging to me would have so disgraced the family! No, that I didn't!"

And then Phillis saw the poor old lady was no longer able to restrain her tears.

"Tell me, I beg of you, what is it? what is the matter?" murmured Phillis, with quivering voice, dreading she knew not what.

"Much obliged to you, my lady, I'm sure"—she put a most exasperating emphasis on the words "my lady"—"and also to your noble protector. Is that the word now-a-days? They used ogther ones in my village when I was a gal. Disgusting! But there, there's no end to the goodness of the man! He wants me—sis—ME!"—she almost screamed out the last word in her ascending tornado of passion,—"to be a party, I suppose, to the sticking you upstairs to play the lady, while I look on—the wretch!"

By degrees Phillis got out what it was that had so wounded her godmother. And as she saw, as she supposed, the whole truth—that Sleuth had actually only been preparing the way for the announcement that they were to be married—she listened with increasing animation of face, with quivering nostril, with an almost painful catching of her breath, in the joyous exultation and consciousness of relief, that threatened a new explosion on the part of the wrathful housekeeper.

"I must go and thank him," said Phillis was hurrying away.

"Sit down. I dare you to go to him!"

"I must—I must, indeed. You don't know. You mistake him—you do, indeed. Don't be angry. Don't be afraid. I'll be back presently, and you shall say then you are sure it all ashamed of me."

She kissed her wondering godmother's troubled and unresisting face, and a minute after was in the drawing-room, where the cunning Sleuth waited—a little nervous, but, on the whole, hopeful as to his proposition he had precipitated.

"What is this, Richard?" she said, the moment she had closed the door.

"Really, Phillis, you should ask her that. I never felt so angry in my life. There was I, at the moment I saw the war clear, trying to make friends with her, offering her everything I could think of, and venturing to hope for as to ask her to give you a pair of diamond ear-rings—cost no end of money—and she sets up her back at me like a wild cat, and grows as if she didn't know what evil, and about which I have a good mind to say I don't care. He's too bad!"

Had Phillis any idea her lover was feeling less anger and mortification than he professed? Or was she still prepared to keep alive her faith in him?—a faith which, as she had to say to many a faultless person—perhaps not even free from actual crime—but still a man who loved her, and whom she felt, on that condition, she too could love.

There was a little pause, during which Phillis looked wistfully at Sleuth, who winced a little, and tried to evade her look. But she came close to him, put her hand into his arm, and said, with earnest, beseeching eyes:

"Richard Sleuth, if you love me these things are nothing. Tell me, do you?"

"DO I?" burst Sleuth in reply.——"

"Richard, say it again. You don't know how sweet it is to me."

Sleuth looked down on the pretty, tearful, but joyous face, which looked up so lovingly and trustingly to him, and he found it hard to utter the words "my love" ready on his lips. And she, watching the change of his face, saw that, and recobbled her caresses, though with a certain modesty, in the entire belief it was only the consequences of her godmother's folly that she was thus driving off.

And if one really could get to such heart as Sleuth's—and probably probably never will—Phillis's image alone rested there. Even now, with her winning, pliant, gentle form hanging about him, and caressing him, he was unable to do the more he had shaped out for himself in the hard spirit he had first intended, and so they got talking over the affair, and ended by agreeing that Milton's intention to leave the house the next day.

Poor Phillis! With what delight she saw his face grow clearer and clearer, as she talked to him! How re-assured she became as to her power over him! How she loved her, and said:

"She may do as she likes, but it won't change me! No, not a bit. And Phillis, darling, perhaps it will be best you to go away for a bit. If she, stupid old woman, made such mistakes, why wouldn't the world do, which is not only stupid, but malignant?"

"Phillis, you are best to me, and it'll be better for both of us. I am a gentleman, now—that brings responsibilities. You must learn to be a lady. I'll send you any money you want, secretly."

"No, Richard, that mustn't be?"

"Very well. Then, you do manage, all by yourself, to pick up what you want, it'll be only a greater proof of your superior nature. Don't cry. I shall write to you?"

"And how long?"

"Oh, who can answer that? You must be sure I shall want to hear from you. This place is dreary even as it is—what'll it be when you are gone? I must get to know people. Get over the time. Think about the property, and Anthony, and me, before I try them with another nine days' wonder about you. But mind, I stick to the arrangement—secret. See what we've got by only trying to break through it too soon. Stupid old woman, so to mistake me! I won't have your godmother's name or mine. No, mind that, Phillis, you had better mind what I say, or you'll find me queer."

"No, Richard, and will trust you. Richard, so long as trust is possible."

"And that'd be for ever, pussy!"

And Sleuth began with his usual affectionate pur then to comfort her.

And so with such talk the lovers kissed and parted; but with the understanding that Sleuth managed to wring out of her, that as Mrs. Milton was to be left in her present benighted state, therefore, after this, no other except a public and formal leave-taking was to take place.

As Phillis went back to her godmother, to abuse out a statement that should meet the double demands upon her, while saying she was ready to go off home to Cumberland, Sleuth stood at the door kissing his hands as she turned at the end of the corridor to look back; and as she disappeared, he returned to the drawingroom, saying:

"She's safe for a few months, at all events. Now for Miss Clarissa" and he gave a little leap as he revelled in the thought of his management of these two women in the kitchen.

CHAPTER XLIX.—RICHARD SLEUTH IN SEARCH OF A FRIEND.

TEN tears—really natural ones—called forth, as he parted with Phillis next morning, had scarcely dried away before he was rolling along on the Brighton down but safe pony, that he had borrowed, to speak Irishly, of Esau. He was learning to ride, and the process troubled him more than he cared to own. However, he kept a good face on the matter, whatever his sufferings and qualms, and he reached Pettersham without an accident.

It was awkward that he should have to slink in by the stable-yard entrance, but he dared not court Miss Pompeus' difficile on his equestrian arrangements and skill; so he silly evaded all notice by adopting the mode of entrance we have indicated—the back way.

He sent in his card, with "Mr. Sleuth's most respectful compliments, and could he see the doctor?"

The doctor was at lunch. It must be owned the doctor was generally found at something of the sort, when not in his magisterial capacity, on horseback, or in bed. He read little. Indeed, what occasion had he to read, when he knew, by present himself, pretty well all men could tell him?

Sleuth was at once introduced to the dining-room, and found the doctor busy at lunch, while Clarissa was reading to him an article about the treatment of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena. Any one could see with the doctor's eyes—poor as a good deal. "He hated Bonaparte," he said, "but he loved magnanimity."

Sleuth caught the sound of the phrase pleased him, as it evidently pleased his daughter, and repeated it just a Sleuth entered, and so put himself in a good temper for the reception of his visitor.

"Good morning!—hem!—good morning, Mr. Sleuth. Sit down and join me."

Sleuth did so, and was not sorry to see Clarissa, after a polite but cold bow, leave the room.

Two minutes or two Sleuth found it easier to discuss the state of the Emperor at St. Helena than his own state, in his present magnificent isolation; and the doctor was too polite to refer to any business that had brought Mr. Sleuth, he said, he might seem to be treating him not as a guest.

With a good deal of flurry in his manner, heat in his face, and stammering in his speech, Sleuth at last began to try once more what his oratory was worth.

"Dear Compeus, I—I hope—no, I mean I'm sure—your politeness, your fatherly friendship—"

"Sir!" said the doctor, icily, and turning his chair half round, he took the better at Sleuth, and learn what he meant.

Sleuth gave a little gulp, as it were, in his throat, and by continuing all his prospects, remembered how he had talked to a more terrible man—his uncle—and at a much more critical time. He resolved to make an attempt.

"I beg pardon, doctor. I am, as you know, not a gentleman born. I—I think my blood is—is respectable, but I confess, it isn't aristocratic; but I am ashamed of what I have said."

"No, sir, I should think not, indeed! Hem!"

"No, doctor; I'm proud of them, in a reasonable way, and I respect those who are superior to me."

"Do you no harm, sir, to be always proud of them!"

"I stand—that is, I sit—corrected. But as I was saying, or meant to say, I was but a poor chemist's assistant when my uncle took me by the hand, and said he would make a man of me, and a gentleman; and he would—doctor, excuse these tears—but I feel he would. He was a strong man, and he could do more difficult things than that."

"Hem! Yes, sir."

"But he was poorly, you see, doctor, and he naturally looked for me to help him in hospital, up, and I wouldn't stand in his way—no, not Anthony's, nothing as he is now; and it was I who wrote to Anthony when poor uncle was dying, and urged him to come."

"I believe that, Mr. Sleuth; and—hem!—I think it was very creditable on your part. Go on."

But Sleuth couldn't go on just for a minute. He was obliged to wait for Providence to send him emotion at the doctor's stern manner. But, as he mastered himself, he was again able to speak.

"Forgive me, doctor, but I am much used to kindness, and your words just then cut me to the core. I do so want to do the right thing, and the gentlemanly thing, and be good with the wealth God has given to me; but—but I want a kind, polite friend in the world to help me and advise me, and I'm so desolate, I almost wish you'd try to persuade Anthony to come back and take it all again, and let me be as I was—his faithful and humble friend!"

Sleuth stopped, and, overpowered at his own pathos, laid down his head on the doctor's table, and wept.

The doctor wiped his glasses, which were growing moist, got up, walked to the window, and looked out contemplatively, and thus gave the unhappy young man time to recover.

"Hem! Mr. Sleuth, could I be of any service to you?"

"You! Oh, doctor, I dare not hope it! No, no. You can't demean yourself to take me by the hand. No. It is only your great kindness and Christian charity that makes you feel for me. But I'm not one to take a mean advantage. No; I have a soul above that. But, oh, Doctor Pompeus, if you would, out of your great knowledge and condescension, only take me and my case into your consideration for a few minutes! It do so want a kind, and wise, and good man to tell me what I shall do, to inspire me with proper sentiments, and to be to me an example—a bright and shining light for me in all my wanderings."

"Hem! hem! hem!"

"I'm worth, Doctor Pompeus, a hundred and sixty thousand pounds, and I want to be shown what to do with it. Shall I expend this wondrous gift on prodigacy, or in ridiculous excess, as the poet says, or shall I make it subserve"—Sleuth had a liking for that, to him, newly-discovered word, and repeated it—"subserve the venerated constitution and institutions of the country—the duties of the country gentleman, the pleasures of a modest domestic life?"

That last bit finished the business. The doctor came to him, held out his hand, and said:

"Mr. Sleuth, my very good friend"—oh, the delicious sound of the words to the happy listener—"whatever help I can render you I think it a duty and a joy. Hem! I've much in my way, but I am a man of truth, and speak only that which I mean. You have, I regret to say, very much to learn."

"Oh, yes!" interrupted Sleuth, with clasped hands. "But do you think I might learn?"

"Here! Yes, I think you may. It is much when a man sees his deficiencies. You don't know how to speak as a gentleman."

"No, doctor, I am so thankful! Go on."

"You don't know how to speak to a gentleman."

"Gospel truth, doctor. I own it. But I will—that is, if you'll condescend to tell me."

"You neither come into a room, nor go out of one, except with the air of a man who is ashamed of himself. Now, sir, if I were to do the most pitiful act in the world, I wouldn't be ashamed of it! If, I say."

"I—I quite understand. Oh, doctor, this is a great day for me! I shall go back with a happy heart, and be a proud man."

"And, Sleuth, mind"—the doctor dropped the "Mr.," and Sleuth responded to the increased familiarity with a grateful smile—"I think I never saw a man so very unpleasant, when out of the togetherncomptible, as you when you address a lady. A lady, sir, likes to see a man a man, but also a gentleman."

"Yes, sir, I perceive. Oh, yes!" And Sleuth looked as if his eye saw through unfathomable distances to the bright and particular star of Truth that the doctor indicated. "Don't spare me, sir. Don't spoil the child, for I am but a child in the ways of the world."

"I know, Sleuth, all that's unpleasant. These things were on my mind, and—hem!—would probably have prevented our having the honour of receiving your visits here, but—but for this very touching, very"—well, I will say it—very manly appeal. For to substance it is manly to confess the truth, however annoying. Sleuth, I offer you my hand."

Sleuth grasped it so suddenly he saw the doctor wince. Then he winced visibly himself, dropped the hand in a fright, and as suddenly regained it. The doctor went on:

"Come here when you like. Hem! You won't mind, for a little while, my taking the liberty to say I am engaged when you call, if I don't want to see you. My daughter may do as you good, if you can only make her acquaintance."

"She's an angel!"

"She's a lady, Mr. Sleuth, and I'm her father; and if you make any more remarks of that kind—hem!—"

He saw the pained face, and his heart smote him.

"Well—well—well. Rome was not built in a day. And I mustn't expect too much. "I will consider the whole subject carefully."

Sleuth was shamed. He thought that meant going back. Then he was mistaken.

"Hem. Perhaps a few hints—hem!—written one—for a young man whose social education has been somewhat neglected. You may, may he not? We will see to that. Come. Let us find Miss Pompeus, and I will introduce you to her under your own roof as a friend of the family, who craves friendly sympathy and support under arduous circumstances. Come."

CHAPTER L.—UNDER THE WHEEL.

TRUE: Anthony is indeed under it—writhing in anguish of mind, being enhanced by the recollection of his late exultation on the topmost rail, when he seemed almost unto himself a spectacle for gods and men—illustrating how fortunate human nature could be.

Whirl is he doing just now? Why, he is toiling on along on the road to Oxford, having just quitted London.

And why alone? Where is Esau? Anthony does not know. The boy had left him when they reached London; and as Anthony suspected, in order to relieve him of the burden of maintenance. Day by day Anthony returned from his many wanderings to the cheap lodging—a bedroom in a poor but clean house in Chelsea—he looked for the lad's bright and cheering face, but he found him not; and at last he felt constrained to own it was most probable Esau thought he could do better without Anthony's aid than with it, and was making fortune in his own way, and alone.

What a terrible place Anthony thought London on this occasion! He could scarcely believe that it was there he had spent so many days, and became indulgent, hours, with boon companions, who agreed but on one thing—to put off to the morrow all care.

He had come with a settled and clear purpose—namely, to go to every man he knew of any respectability of character, carefully shunning all other acquaintances, and see whether, after letting them know of his position, they could suggest how he might earn his bread.

At first he was delighted with the hospitable reception, even after he had told, with manly frankness, of his downfall, lest the fact might not have reached them. But as soon as the first glow of feeling had passed off, he could not but discover they were one and all immersed in their own affairs, whether of business or pleasure, and, while very willing to see him at their tables, or even to take an occasional bed in their houses, were not the least disposed to go into practical matters—such as he yearned to hear.

But he determined to go the whole round of his acquaintances, in spite of these disappointments, and then they saw him no more! He had failed to discover a single opening.

But he had Oxford still to fall back on. There he had played the gentleman, and, being a few youthful pranks, had played the part not discreditably. He had been, in short, about three debts, fortunately, he had been able to pay, during his brief period of prosperity, out of the sideboard estate. He was not aware that his conscience did not in the least feel hurt that Sleuth might say it was out of his money. He should be glad to find, for a time, a home with Anthony by a prior right, for the alderman had not only sent him to Oxford, but continued his offence by telling him, on one occasion, he could "afford to wash" him, and then—. But then came the worse offence, that caused Anthony to be ejected from the kitchen.

He was going to Oxford. What for? To play the part Mr. Babington had done in? To certificate a hundred pounds, and have unwilling pockets by arts as contemptible as those of his quondam acquaintance and brother collegian?

If he could get employment in the service of the centre of business, was it likely he could do any good among youthful students, who could only be taught by men who had failed?

He had pondered over every possible kind of industry. Literature? He had no ability for it. The professions? He was not prepared with means. For trade? And as to trade, that was just what he had been exploring with such lamentable results. Emigration, perhaps? In a subject, even the post of riding master to a Western house, he thought of, and sought for, but obtained neither engagement nor promise of any.

The army? Yes, that was the one seductive thought that kept Anthony in heart; for not only did he think he should make a good officer, but he had just cool hunt hope of a commission. Had a young aristocratic friend, who had once urged Anthony, in his time of bitter disappointment, to offer officially to the Duke of Wellington for regiment which was commanded by his brother, who, he was sure, would sympathise with his poverty and his misfortune, and promptly give him the support a man so situated must have. Anthony was afraid he could not live on his pay, however good a soldier he might be, but still that the prospect was attractive, for, to tell the truth, it was one that led, so he fancied—by a circuitous route—to Clarissa, and the possession of Clarissa.

Why, then, does he stop now on the brow of the hill, which has just brought him within sight of the dreaming towers and spires of ancient Oxford? Is it because he has read not one, but two paragraphs in a newspaper, that he had come across in a waggon, and where he had expended his last money—twopence—in a roll and a glass of ale?

These are the paragraphs:

"Rumor is busy in a certain neighborhood, not a hundred miles from the metropolis, with the murder and disfigurement of a gentleman—some heaven save the mark!—who had suddenly passed from a state of great prosperity to entire indigence. It is said he had in his pocket-book, found on the very first hour of his coming to the house where he is at present lodging, a document by which he was able to hold all against the rightful possessor. And that when this document was first found, by accidentally made, and under circumstances that might be called really providential—he not only expressed no regret, but, on the contrary, seemed but abused the man he had wronged; and who, from the last letter received, had been given him a handsome sloe of the property, if he had only exhibited an appropriate degree of sorrow. Sorrow he is gone, and the neighborhood is well rid of him. His successor promises to be quite a blessing to the whole town, and the darkness by which he had all the old women of the neighborhood to dine with him, and each found half-a-crown under her plate.

That was the way in which rumors dealt with Anthony; and Anthony, as he read it, seemed to feel as if a great load was taken from the sky and overspread the whole earth.

And what was the other paragraph? Seemingly very unimportant one. Only a name among the list of deaths. But this name was the name of his one friend—his last hope and refuge.

"On the 20th inst., of disease of the heart, very gentle seemed to say, "I contend no longer! Life is not worth all this to me."

The sun was just fading in a rich trail of glory. He watched it even as he bent his head on his elbows, which were supported on his knees—watched it fade and fade, and the darkness slowly steal on and envelope everything, saw the stars come out, felt the fresh but chilly breath of evening, and shivered; but still he sat, even when he could gaze no longer.

And then lower and lower sank the head—lower and lower sank the once stately form of Clarissa's future husband, his hopes of a future—were they not all as rich and glowing as that sunset?—and, overcome by mental pain, he was down! The sun would rise again; his sun—never! never!

Tears—bitter tears, oozed forth. He could have done all but to be weak. Some one of the old Greek heroes was dear to him in one sense—he was unpolluted by any act of dishonour—it might be dishonourable to weep, but he could and was gone now. His name stank in the place where he had been so happy and so much respected—so much looked up to.

He knew that he ought to spring up with fresh activity, and take fate, as it were, by the throat, and compel her to obedience and justice. He only dropped down lower and lower, where he sat till there seemed but a hopeless man, like a rock of stone, visible through the darkness.

How long he remained in that terrible stupor of soul, he knew not. When he was awakened from it, it was by a light touch on his shoulder.

"Esau!"

In an instant he was on his feet.

"See! ~ quick! they're after me! Let me hide!"

The boy was panting with affright and swift running.

"They?—who?" And Anthony vainly strove to pierce the darkness above the long whitish slope of the road, up which he and Esau had come.

"There they are!" again panted Esau. "Don't you hear the horse and the carts?"

"They shan't touch you. Stay, Esau; don't be a coward?"

Anthony laid his hand upon the boy's shoulder, who was trembling in his excitement, and said:

"They must deal with me before they touch you. Why, Esau, I used to think you the bravest lad I had ever met with."

Esau was unaccountably silent, and before Anthony could get any explanation, a cart drove up containing two men, who instantly leaped out, leaving the horse, which seemed to have been trained to stand during ticklish operations.

The first man who approached needed but to speak a single word to be known to the boy. He is also well known to us as Bob the Ostler. The single word was:

"Esau!"

"What do you what with this lad?" demanded Anthony.

"What's that to you? Curse your impudence! Ain't I his parent? What do you want with him, my bully boy?"

"Esau, is that true? Is he your father?"

The lad's hands were cold and damp, Anthony felt. He pressed them, and tried to reassure the boy.

"I don't want to go with him! I won't go!"

"Then you shan't!" said Anthony. "There, my friends, you have your answer, and had better go."

"Hore's a pretty cock of the walk! Jim, let's have the coves up for assault! Here you son mine, and he shall feel it, if seeing won't do."

Jim's pistol was heard only too plainly. Anthony tried to reason with them, but they only laughed.

Suddenly, when he had turned to see what Bob was at—as—a—a—a—threatening movement towards Esau—he found his arms pinioned from behind by a grasp so powerful, that after a mighty struggle he relaxed all effort, and felt he was powerless—weakened, as he had been, by hunger and sorrow.

"Are your manage him for a couple of minutes?"

"Can I? Ax him!" was the reply of Bob's worthy associate.

"Run, Esau, run!" shouted Anthony.

But it was too late. Bob had stepped him up at the first sign of movement, and the lad, in spite of his struggles—which were still accompanied by a reticence—was being forced to Esau's old habits, and that amazed Anthony, even amidst all the distractions of the moment—was carried in the father's arms to the cart, and tied fast in it, as Anthony could hear by the remark:

"There, you varmint! You'll run away again from your parents, will you? We'll give you a roll you? All right, Jim. Let him go. I'm ready for him if he meddles with you."

But Jim had no thought of securing his personal safety. With a very slight effort, yet one that only a skilful, probably professional, pugilist could so accomplish, he despatched an Ordinary, who was wary and watchful for any chance that might offer, he suddenly, without relaxing his grasp, threw himself backwards over the rough ground, and so disturbed the latter's balance, that when he let go and slipped aside and struck Anthony on the temple, the latter could do no other than go headlong to the earth.

In an instant he was on his feet pursuing the man in spite of his weapon. But Jim reached the side of the cart, and Anthony, who stopped a little way off, and cried to Esau:

"Seek me at the Magnet, Esau, if you can't tell me where to find me!"

They were driving off when again Anthony called out:

"Esau! Esau! what's his name?"

"Ax the baldermen's ghost, and he'll tell you, and spell it for you, if yer ain't a scholar—Dye hear? S-T-O-K-E-S!"

"Stop, stop! one moment, I conjure you! Esau, Esau! My kinsman, brother! I'll find you if I trust you were the world."

No answer. The ruffians had gagged the boy.

AN APPLICATED ENTITION.—The Charlottesville (Va.) Chronicle says: "A desperate war has broken out that surrounds him: "Charlottesville is fairly entitled to be called the literary centre of the South. There is, at the University alone, with its learned faculty, a score on all sorts of subjects. Then we have two large female seminaries of the very highest character, or forty things ending in —ology. Then we have some half-dozen first-class academies for boys. Then several local societies. Then a number of schools for the English branches. And then the whole colored population, of all ages, is literally a big, black school. Every b-a-b-b-a, b-b-o, b-b-l; l-a-d-d-e; d-o-g-d-o-g-g—and so on, from morning to night, is the lesson in orthography. There are some four or five schools in operation, and the whole mass darkens every door with primers in their hands. If we pass a blacksmith's shop we hear a-n-v-i-l and e-n-g-i-n-e. Mr. Grey has shrewd up lumber here. If you send a little negro boy on an errand, he is spelling everything he meets in one syllable. The little white boys look at them wonderingly and try to cut them. In a month or so we expect to issue an evening edition of the Chronicle in syllables, to increase our circulation—perhaps a pictorial, with tabs and spades, and ants and cows, and owls and bats—like the primers.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

THERE is a Methodist preacher out West who is praise is thus sounded by a contemporary:

"We have repeatedly heard the most famous men in America, but there are times when the flame of his genius lacks the everlasting hills with a roar that moves a mountain to sleep, he has enchanted his auditors.

Our little lives are kept in equipoise
By struggles of two opposite desires—
The struggle of the instinct that enjoys,
And the more noble instinct that aspires.

JOHN BILLINGS ON SHANGHAIS.—The shanghi reaster is a gentle, and speaks in a forun tung. He is the son of Emperor Tien Sung Hill cruser. He has but bin with legs he was resembul the peruvian lama. He has a long tail, and can't quite make sense of what he best in a ruff and tumble fite; like the injins that kan stand civilization, but not the sivvies. He has reost on the ground similar tew the mud-turkle. The otten are fond of him, and use him for a pet, and when they dew they cuter the ground like a pickaxe. Their favorite food is angle-worms. He duz not like a jackass troubled with the bronkeseucks. The will eat a hoss-fly with a perfect stoical indifference. He will sit down rite oph tew keep from tipping over. The are dredfully unhandy to keep, for when you go to put them to a time, you hunt got them awl into a poken fit to hold. The female reaster lays a egg as big as a kokanut, and as sickt as a rock afterwards, and when the chickens first come out they shanghai, which is a brood over them standing, and then kust kluer bull ye them, the rest stay around on the outside, like bum around a circus tent, setting a peep under the awnings. Then one day a Yankee man who first brought the reasters into the country cought on to the game, and he shanghaid a hen, and got six grasshoppers cawht by hand. I never owned but one reaster, and he got his death by a kick in the abdomin, but not till he had swallowed 18 cent or it. Not long afterwards he died, and as he could not raise board a traveling colporter, who was burnrd, roasted bole, and stuffed with a pair of onjun roasters, and has not since shanghaid the rest on a shanghai.

The latest French story is briefly this: Monsieur X., intemperate fearer, is found dead in bed, apparently for many hours as a log. Physicians are beldide; no go. Funeral ordered; procession of village. Then one thing and then another with mourners since citizens admire his character, and so does curate their mourning is shaped. Curate of Saint X., dainty and sweet 16-grassant combination—and ceremonies begin. Curate about to be said, when heard inside undertakers fly; courageous doctor raises himself on his elbow and says, well, well, very thirsty; found daughter suddenly exclaims men pere; rejoicings of everybody; denouement; reward of virtue.

A man was found sleeping on the street stepped on a piece of melon skin and fell to the pavement. "Thank God," the fearer, "there's another left." there's another individual trying to do the European tour at home—and without a trip to Canada?"

A CLERK in a New York mercantile establishment relates a colloquy from which a sprightly youth in his employ came out second best. A poor boy came along with his machine, inquiring:

"Any boots to-day, sir?"

"Don't think we have," replied the young gentleman, "but perhaps you can't you sharpen wits?"

"Yes, if you've got any," was the prompt response, leaving the interrogator rather at a loss to produce the article.

A CLERGYMAN and one of his elderly parishioners were walking home from church on a day lately when the old gentleman slipped and fell flat on the ice. The minister, looking on with concern, and being assured that he was not much hurt, said to him:

"Friend, I cannot help thinking that you—"

The old south man looked up, as if to assure himself that he had not, and said:

"I see they do, but I can't."

"Always buy your chestnuts blued," said Mrs. Grover to Abimelech, who was about investing a penny in that commodity, "cause the raw ones want to be cooked, and the cooked ones want to be warmed, so you'll get with the blued ones it don't make no difference—worms can't hurt nobody when they're biled."

A LETTER writer describing the fashionable costumes worn at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, says:

He observed that the prevailing style of garter was blue."

The style of the dress enabled him to make the observation.

DR.——, on one occasion, received no fee for curing a certain gentleman of a bad leg, and thus several months after in social gathering took up the theme and exclaimed:

"I believe I have a mortgage on this child!"

Whereupon, rather than have an explanation before the company, quietly handed over a five dollar bill.

TOPEN'S EXCUSE.

"Then the Lord old Noah said,
The water now tastes very bad,
You must have been drinking brandy
All beasts and sinners in their sin—
Departing in a hurry, Lord I vow
I would prefer some other drink."

A LONDON paper says that "her Majesty is still pleased to search for the late Prince Consort!"

THE PUNCTUAL MAN.—Mr. Higgins was a very punctual man in all the transactions through life. He amassed a large fortune by untiring industry and punctuality. At the advanced age of 70 years was resting quietly on his bed, and calmly waiting to be called home. He had previously arranged with every arrangement for his decease and burial. He had selected the hymn he would like to have sung, and fixedness in his society, when one of his sons observed: "Father, you will probably live but one day or two; is it not well for you to name your bearers?"

"Yes, my son," said the dying man; "it is well thought of, and I will do it now."

He gave the names of six, the number and size of the hearse, and then upon his pillow.

A gleam of thought passed over his sunburned features, like a dark cloud over the ocean's azure noon. My son, read me the list. Is the name of Mr. Wiggins there?"

"Yes, father."

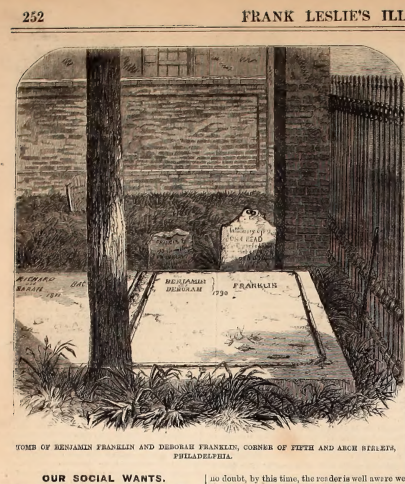
"Then strike it off!" said he, emphatically, "for he was a mean man, and would not be a bearer to me now, and he might hinder the procession a whole hour."

THE Duke of Wellington's palace at the ancient capital of France, the tapestry frequently presents the arms of the Bourbons, surmounted by the dignity of an apartment in the palace of the ex-Duke of Angoulême, the grandson of Louis XV., in which a man is seen running after Noah, and calling out, "My good friend, I am starving; pray give me something to eat."

SOMEBODY has found out a new way of taking pictures, by which they can be taken better in the dark. Why don't they try home. A photographer has missed several from the frames that hang by his door, and is determined to have the next one.

WHEN IS A MAN DRUNK?—The Troy Press furnishes the following conversation which took place in the street car in that city. It settles the much disputed question—"When is a man drunk?"

Lawyer—What Mr. Graham drunk?



Witness—(Metaphysically)—Well, I'll tell you. I don't think he was drunk, because it is pretty hard to tell when a man is really drunk.

Is—Then you have got enlarged ideas on the subject of drunk?

W.—Yes, sir. I call a person sober as long as he can walk straight and not stagger.

Is—Then you say he don't lail in the gutter?

W.—Yes, sir; and don't catch hold of the grass to keep himself from rolling over!

OUR SOCIAL WANTS.

GROWTH, to be perfect, must be uniform. When one member of a body increases in size more rapidly than the others, the result is deformity. On the other hand, when the growth of one part is retarded, while the whole increases, that which should be a limb is only an excrescence. And this is true, not only of animal and vegetable but also of social life, and of the conditions of civilization among which we exist.

A great city is planted near the sea, in a position unsurpassed for natural beauty, for safety and for accessibility to the vast interior country that lies behind it, no less than to the fleets from foreign nations that flock thither to trade. Its growth is at first slow. The crest of the ridge which, on each side slopes gradually to the waters washing its shores, becomes naturally the chief, as it is, the most commanding thoroughfare. The streets leading from this ridge to the edges of the waters have their position and direction determined almost by chance; a sequestered path, leading to meadows beyond the city limits, becomes, in time, a lane, and that, in its turn, a street, keeping for ever the tortuous course originally given it; or some rampart, in early times designed to repel a lurking enemy, bestows alike its name and its direction on its modern descendant.

But, in process of time, this city grows and becomes famous, and the length of its streets is measured by miles instead of yards. Still, as before, the leading thoroughfare lies along the ridge, and the streets diverging from it to the right and left increase in length. Their direction, however, is no longer an affair of caprice. In proportion as the city recedes from the apex of the triangular piece of land on which it stands, so do its dimensions in width increase, and an uniform plan is laid down by law, according to which the growth longitudinally follows the lines of certain avenues, and laterally by equidistant streets.

So far in our goodly city of New York, of which, no doubt, by this time, the reader is well aware we are writing, its growth has been well cared for as regards its uniformity. As the avenues have increased in length, houses and habitations of various degrees of beauty and usefulness have lined their sides, while the cross streets, reaching from the waters on the east to those on the west, have few vacant spots yet unbuilt upon. All this, so far, is most excellent. A splendid city has sprung up, and its increase, during the past few years, seems almost like a work of enchantment; but when we come to look at the means provided for moving from place to place in this immense hive of humanity, the disproportion, the want of harmony between the enormous distances, and the means of overcoming them, strike a stranger with a sense of pain, even if the inconvenience be not brought home to him in a practical manner. The complaint, to be sure, is not a new one. For some years past it has been periodically brought before the public in many and various forms. The true remedy will in time, and perhaps very speedily, be applied; and the wonder of people will then be that they had so long endured an evil, of which the cure was so simple.

The development, however, of the means of transportation naturally, and in the first place, takes the direction of the chief lines of travel, and those are, "up-town" and "down-town." Whether the street cars perform all they were designed for we do not intend now to discuss, nor whether—a still wider question—they perform their duties in the best possible manner. But, certainly, they do carry, in some way or other, from their homes to their daily business, and from business to their homes, an enormous number of those who, but for the facilities (such as they are) thus afforded them, would be compelled to lose much valuable time in walking. All, however, do not want to go "down-town," to attend to business, or prefer to do so at their leisure, and society is assuming a phase in which the numbers of these are rapidly increasing, and what are they to do? What, again, are those to do who wish to go "across town," to travel laterally and not longitudinally, in this good city of Gotham? Suppose you are in Union square, a heavy shower of rain comes on, or some pressing occasion calls you to the foot of Fourteenth street, N. B., how are you to go there? Only a choice of evils awaits you. Walk, and get wet through, for the benefit of your doctor possibly, and certainly of your milliners, madam, or of your tailors, sir, and of your own great discomfort and cost; or call a heavy, lumbering vehicle, fit only for a funeral procession, from which it has probably just returned, and be charged a dollar, besides enduring the insolence of one of the most insolent set of men in the city.

Yet our vaunted civilization can produce nothing better than this. If you want a vehicle, for ever so short a distance, you are condemned to violate your sense of fitness by hiring two horses, when one would answer every purpose, and a carriage that holds four persons (six for funeral occasions) when one of half the size would be more than enough. And you are charged in proportion, not of your need, but of the need of the man that drives you. Even this miserable excrescence of our society, the two-horse carriage or hackney coach (we believe that in London the last of the species is preserved as a curiosity in one of the museums), is not always to be procured when dire necessity compels a quick journey out of the car routes.

Imagine yourself in Madison square or Wall street, through the exigencies of business five minutes behind time for the steamboat at one of the piers on the North River; you would probably pay five dollars rather than miss the last chance of getting home that night; but fifty will not procure you the means of atoning, by a horse's speed, for your unpardonable delay.

What, then, shall we do to get rid of this blot upon our character as a go-ahead people? What shall we substitute for the massive, lumbering, two-horse concerns, fit only for civic or funeral processions, that render life a burden to those compelled to use them? Is there no escape from the exorbitant charge of fifty cents per mile for one, and twenty-five cents for each additional person? Is there no cure for tire personal abuse with which a payment of the legal fare is received, or the insolence with which its double is generally demanded? Let us see.

If New York were the first and only city that had suffered from overgrowth, or in which the distances were too great for simple pedestrians, we might hesitate as to the solution of the problem. Fortunately it is not, and in the cab systems of London and Paris we may learn how other crowded and civilized communities avoid the evils from which we now suffer, and which have reached a height which imperatively demand reform.

Our illustration, No. 1, shows the average New York cab (gross misnomer) of the present day, in all its unwieldiness of breadth, and height, and length. Contrast with it illustration No. 2, of the average London Brougham cab, its lightness, its handiness, its one word, its adaptability; or No. 3, the Hansom cab, made to thread its way through crowded streets, take short turns, and catch flying trains against all odds of time and distances. Of these public conveyances there are in London over 5,000. Fancy New York with a thousand of the number, distributed at fifty convenient points between the Central Park and the Battery! Imagine the increased comfort in life; the enhanced value to real estate at points beyond the present termini of the street cars and the omnibuses; and the gratitude of the fair sex, who will not find it necessary any longer to renounce all acquaintances and friends living more than four "blocks" away.

In London the rates of the cab fare are regulated by the distance or by the time, at the option of the hirer. The numbers of the cabs are attached to them in large legible figures, and the police regulations in regard to them are hung conspicuously inside. The following are the rates of fare, reduced to currency at the present price of gold, for the convenience of our readers:

Fares by Distance for Two Persons.

Eighteen cents for any distance within and not exceeding one mile.

For any distance exceeding one mile, at the rate of eighteen cents for every mile, and for any part of a mile not completed.

The driver is to drive at a proper and reasonable speed, not less than six miles an hour, unless in cases of unavoidable delay.

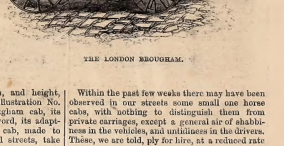
Fares by Time for Two Persons.

For any time within and not exceeding one hour, seventy-two cents.

Eighteen cents for every fifteen minutes, or any part of fifteen minutes not completed, above one hour.

The driver may be required to drive at any rate not exceeding four miles an hour.

Of the regulations of this establishment, of the manner in which the rights and interests of the public are protected, of the easy and inexpensive remedy for complaints, it is not necessary now to enlarge. Many of these are only adapted to the locality where they prevail, and would be unsuited to the genius of our people, but when the system itself can once be grafted upon our community, the proper regulation of it will be a matter of little or no difficulty.



In Paris the system is again different, and we now proceed to describe it. The city is surrounded by barriers, and within these, a diameter of about six miles, only a single rate is charged; that is, you may go any distances within those bounds for a charge of thirty-seven cents in our currency. If any stoppage is made, however, the "course," as it is called, recommences. If hired by the hour the charge is sixty cents of our currency, and in hiring it is always advisable to agree with the driver whether you are to be carried by the "course," or by the hour.

THE NEW YORK COACH.

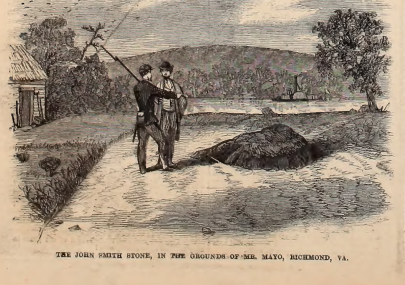
One excellent regulation exists by which the driver is obliged to hand to each person engaging his cab a ticket bearing his number, so that any article left in the vehicle can be easily reclaimed, and the municipality gives, every year, a prize to the drivers who have most distinguished themselves by restoring lost property.



THE LONDON BROUGHAM.

Within the past few weeks there may have been observed in our streets some small one horse cabs, with nothing to distinguish them from private carriages, except a general air of shabbiness in the vehicles, and unhiliness in the drivers. These, we are told, ply for hire, at a reduced rate of fare from the large, lumbering concerns we, in the interests of the public, have condemned. It is reported that they are set up under some recent State law, and are owned by some company. Be this as it may, we hail these conveyances as the pioneers of a new and a better system. But let us exhort the proprietors to lay aside the timid, hesitating way in which they have come before their patrons. They need not blush for their enterprise, nor be ashamed of small beginnings. We assure them the public will welcome with enthusiasm anything in the shape of cheap and rapid means of locomotion. Let these cabs, if really for hire, have written upon them in large and legible characters that they are so. We recommend a large plate on the door, or on the back of the vehicle, bearing the number of the license, and the name of the company, if there be one, to whom the public is so much indebted. Above all things, let us know what their fares are, and let these be as low as is consistent with a fair return on the capital. And let them not fear that the market can be overstocked, that too many cabs can be found in the streets, or on widely distributed stands, that the drivers can be too civil, that the horses can be too good, or their carriages too clean. Let us know where complaints can be made, where they will be respectfully listened to, and prompt remedies applied. Companies are organised for the prompt delivories of messages and parcels. Is the prompt conveyance of our bodies likely to meet with less public favor than these?

RAILROAD INCIDENT—THE METAMORPHOSIS.

We looked towards the young lady for a concluding tale of the train, and that Scheherezade of our compartment, without the least pretence of incapacity or hoarseness, commenced at once the following adventure,

"Although," she commenced, "I am often compelled to travel without a companion" (the commercial traveller sighed), "yet have I such a dislike to the company of babies and sick folk, that I never make a journey in the ladies' carriages. Only once, however, have I suffered any inconvenience through my unprotected condition, and that exception occurred very lately, and upon this very line. After I had taken my seat one morning at Paddington, in an empty carriage, I was joined, just as the train was moving off, by a strange-looking young man, with remarkably long flowing hair. He was, of course, a little hurried, but he seemed besides to be disturbed and wild that I was quite alarmed, for fear of his not being in his right mind, nor did his subsequent conduct at all reassure me. Our train was an express, and he inquired eagerly, at once, which was the first station whereat we were advertised to stop. I consulted my Bradshaw and furnished him with the required information. It was Reading. The young man looked at his watch.

"'Madam,' said he, 'I have but half an hour by your kind and courageous conduct you have saved my life, and, perhaps, even your own.'

"In another minute he was gone, and the train was in motion. Not till the next morning did I learn from the Times newspaper that the gentleman on whom I had operated as haircutter had committed a forgery to an enormous amount, in London, a few hours before I met him, and that he had been tracked into the express train from Paddington; but that, although the telegraph had been put in motion and described him accurately—at Reading, when the train was searched, he was nowhere to be found."

THE JOHN SMITH STONE.

WITH the march of improvement the old landmarks of our history are being swept away one by one, and, we regret to say, that we are not a people to perpetuate them, either by preservation upon the spots of their origination or by removing them to a museum.

The illustration we give is that of of the "John Smith Stone," to which an authentic legend has attached a peculiar interest, as the identical spot whereon the brave captain lay when about to be sacrificed to the ire of the great chief Powhatan, and from which fearful death he was rescued by the beautiful Pocahontas. The story is too familiar to be repeated, and we believe has never been disputed.

The stone is in grounds of Mr. Mayo, brother of the former Mayor of Richmond, and is within a mile or two of the city, and a spot that is visited by every sightseer who visits that now historical city.

THE INDIAN MESMERIST.

WHILST at BIJNORE, I was seized with an attack of tic-douloureux, and suffered all its extreme agonies. One of my host's servants informed me that there was a very clever native doctor in the village, who could immediately assuage any pain—

ITEMS OF TRAVEL—THE INDIAN MESMERIST.

lately heard of mesmerism, he said; but, years before he heard of it, he was in the habit of curing people by assuaging their pain. The gift had been given to him soon after he attained manhood. Thus, with one exception, and that was in the case of a Kerance—a half-caste—no patient had ever fallen asleep, or had become beehoh (unconscious), under his gaze. "The case of the half-caste," he went on to say, "alarmed me. He fell asleep for twelve hours, snoring like a man in a state of intoxication." I was not the first European he had operated upon, he said; that in Bareilly, where he formerly lived, he had afforded relief to many officers and to several ladies. Some had toothache, some tic-doloreux, some other pains. "But," he exclaimed, energetically, "the most extraordinary case I ever had, was that of a sahib who had gone mad—'drink delirious.' His wife would not suffer him to be strapped down, and he was so violent that it took four or five other sahibs to hold him. I was sent for, and, at first, had great difficulty with him and much trembling. At last, however, I looked his eyes up, as soon as I got him to look at me, and kept him for several hours as quiet as a mouse, during which time he had no brandy, no wine, no beer; and, though he did not sleep, he had a good long rest. I stayed with him for two days, and whatever I told him to do he did immediately. He had great sorrow on his mind, poor man. Three of his children had died of fever within one short week, and he had lost much money by the failure of an agency-house in Calcutta. There was a cattle sergeant, too, an European, whom I also cured of that drinking madness by looking up his eyes."

"What do you mean by looking-up his eyes?"

"Well, what I did with you; I looked up your eyes. When I got his eyes fixed on mine, he could not take them away—could not move."

"But can you look up any one's eyes in the way that you looked up mine?"

"No; not every body's. There was an artillery captain once who defied me to look up his eyes. I tried very hard; but, instead of looking up his, he looked up mine, and I could not move till he permitted me. And there was a lady, the wife of a judge, who had pains in the head, which I could not cure, because she locked up my eyes. With her I trembled much, by straining every nerve, but it was of no use."

RAILROAD INCIDENT—THE METAMORPHOSIS.

"Do you know any other native who has the same power that you possess?"

"Only three; but, I dare say, there may be hundreds in these provinces who have it, and who use it. And now, sahib," said the native doctor, taking from his kummerbund (the cloth that encircles the waist) a bundle of papers, "I desire to show you some of my certificates, at the same time to beg of you to pardon my apparent want of respect in appearing in your presence in this skull-cap, instead of a turban; but the fact is, that when I heard you were in such great pain, I did not think it humane to delay until I had adorned myself."

I proceeded to examine, very carefully, every one of his many certificates; not that I was in any way interested in them, but because I knew it would afford him great pleasure. In all, they were quite as numerous as those which English charlatans publish in testimony of their skill in extracting corns. They were more elaborate, however; for it is by the length of a certificate that a native judges of its value—just in the same way that Partridge, when Tom Jones took him to see Hamlet, admired the character of the King, because he spoke louder than any of the company, "anybody could see that he was a king." As for myself, I sat down and covered a whole sheet of foolscap in acknowledgment of my gratitude to Mustapha Khan Bahadoor, for having delivered me from unendurable torments. To my certificate I penned a cheque on the North-West Bank for one hundred rupees (fifty dollars), and presenting both documents to the doctor, permitted him to take his leave. Some months afterwards, on discovering that this cheque had not been presented for payment, I wrote to the assistant magistrate, and asked him, as a favor, to send for the native doctor, and obtain some information on the subject. In reply, I was informed that the doctor preferred keeping the cheque appended to my certificate, as an imperishable memorial of the extraordinary value in which his services had been held by an European gentleman, and that he would not part with it for ten times the amount in gold or silver. Such a strange people are the natives of India. Their cupidity is enormous, certainly, but their vanity (I am speaking of the better class) is even greater. One hundred rupees was equal to half a year's earnings of the native doctor, and between me and, it may be, ruin. Excuse, therefore, my abruptness. You have, I perceive, a pair of scissors in your workbag. Oblige me, if you please, by cutting off all my hair."

"Sir," said I, 'it is impossible.'

"'Madam,' he urged, and a look of severe determination crossed his features; 'I am a desperate man. Beware how you refuse me what I ask. Cut my hair off—short, close to the roots—immediately; and here is a newspaper to hold the ambrosial curls.'

"I thought he was mad, of course; and believing that it would be dangerous to thwart him, I cut off all his hair to the last lock.

"'Now madam,' said he, unlocking a small portmanteau, 'you will further oblige me by looking out of window, as I am about to change my clothes.'

Of course I looked out of window for a very considerable time, and when he observed, 'Madam, I need no longer put you to any inconvenience,' I did not recognise the young man in the least.

"Instead of his former rather gay costume, he was attired in black, and wore a gray wig and silver spectacles; he looked like a respectable divine of the Church of England, of about 64 years of age; to complete that character, he held a volume of sermons in his hand, which—they appeared so to absorb him—might have been his own.

"'I do not wish to threaten you, young lady, he resumed, 'and I think, besides, that I can trust your kind face. Will you promise me not to reveal this metamorphosis until your journey's end?'

"'I will,' said I, 'most certainly.'

"At Reading, the guard and a person in plain clothes looked into our carriage.

"'You have the ticket, my love,' said the young man, blandly, and looking at me as though he were my father.

"'Never mind, sir; we don't want them,' said the official, as he withdrew with his companion.

"'I shall now leave you, madam,' observed my fellow-traveller, as soon as the coast was clear; toothache for instance—and he begged permission to touch him to see me. I consented.

The native doctor was a tall, thin Mussulman, with a lofty forehead, small black eyes, long aquiline nose, and finely chiselled mouth and chin. His hair, eyebrows and long beard were of a yellowish white or cream color. Standing before me in his shift-cap, he was about the most ungainly-looking person I ever beheld. His age did not exceed forty-four or forty-five years. He put several questions to me, but I was in too great pain to give him any replies. He begged of me to sit down. I obeyed him, mechanically. Seating himself in a chair immediately opposite to me, he looked very intently into my eyes. After a little while, his gaze became disagreeable, and I endeavored to turn my head aside, but I was unable to do so. I now felt that I was being mesmerised. Observing, I suppose, as expression of anxiety, if not of fear, on my features, he bade me not be alarmed. I longed to order him to cease; but, as the pain was becoming less and less acute, and as I retained my consciousness intact, I suffered him to proceed. To tell the truth, I doubt whether I could have uttered a sound. At all events, I did not make the attempt. Presently, that is to say, after two or three minutes, the pain had entirely left me, and I felt what is commonly called, all in a glow. The native doctor now removed his eyes from off mine, and inquired if I were better. My reply, which I made with difficulty in giving it, was in the affirmative; in short, that I was completely cured. Observing that he placed his hands over his head and pressed his skull, I asked him if he were suffering.

"Yes, slightly," was his reply. "But I am so accustomed to it, it gives me but little inconvenience."

I then begged of him to explain to me how it was that he had the power to afford me such marvellous relief. That, he said, he was unable to do. He did not know. I then talked to him of mesmerism, and of the wonderful performances of Doctor Esdaile in the Calcutta hospital. He had yet he preferred nodding the useless autograph of an insignificant which like myself for the sentiment, rather than realise it. The native doctor evidently reasoned thus: "I might spend the one hundred rupees, might not be believed if I made the assertion that I had received it; but here is the voucher." Some may imagine that he kept it as a sort of decoy-duck; but this, I am perfectly satified, was not the case.

AN EAST INDIAN EXECUTION.

He was then led up to the scaffold, the most primitive affair that I ever beheld. It was only a piece of woodwork resembling a large crock or crate in which a dinner-service is packed for exportation. Upon this crock, which was placed under the beam, he was required to stand, having obeyed this order, the rope was adjusted around his neck. The assistant magistrate then called out to him, in Hindostance, "Have you anything to say?"

"Yes, Sahib," was the reply. And he began a long story—false from beginning to end; but every word of which the linguists writer took down. He spoke, and with vehemence, for about 35 minutes, when, having straightened himself finally or to take leave, the assistant magistrate gave the signal to the jailer, by waving his hand. The crock was then pulled from under the culprit by the two policemen, and down dangled the culprit's body, but not more than 18 inches from the ground.

They are not adepts in the art of hanging in India; it took the culprit at least 10 minutes to die. At times I fancied—sometimes even his struggles—that he would break the beam, snap the rope, or bring down the whole apparatus. In the days of Henry Fielding, the law used to speak of hanging as "dancing on nothing;" and although the hero in Indian culprit, in the present hanging, amply realized. The reader must not, however, sympathize with the dying. He had been justly convicted and was justly put to death for murdering, in that very hotel where he resided his offering, a Sikh child of seven years of age, in order to possess himself of a silver bangle or worn-ring, made valued at one rupee and a-quarter (half-a-crown of English money). I cannot excuse myself of a certain mental disposition, but, of late, ever since I now hanged had had a thousand lives instead of one, I could have witnessed the taking away of one of them without a single atom of a desire to save him.

The cutting down of the culprit, as soon as it was discovered that he was dead, was one of those scenes of pickpocks and vendors of cakes and gingerbeer to take a look at him. The procedure here is the unnecessary, was quite as primitive as the foregoing part of the operation. The native policemen, summoned to the blunt sword, severed the rope by sawing it just above the head, and then the corpse was carried away to be thrown out of the hanging—in which, either before or the assistant had witnessed the execution—and examined, for rather dubious reasons, by a finer head, in a phrenological point of view, I had never seen across the naked shoulders and suspended the sacred thread, indicating that the culprit was a Brahmin.

LIFE IN A WATER-DROP.—Clear and transparent as life seems to be; rarely our vision attempts to discover the last evidence of life, or the smallest creature in God's works. A drop of water, in itself, contains any living object: the breath of your mouth is to our (magic) to splash a few rays of water on the eye are sufficient to convert it into vapor. But re-place this drop of water in the clean aqueous of glass, and beneath the microscope, and, lo! what life is suddenly presented—every leaf and tree seems. The little drop has expanded into a large globe; wonderful shapes, and black-and-white animals, growing towards and repulsing each other, or resting lazily, and feeding from particles, as if they were crushed on the waves of an extensive sea. Here is an animal, with a large oval, swing round, and suspended the sacred thread, indicating that the culprit was a Brahmin.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS!

Splendid Jewelry, Watches, Diamonds, &c.

The House of BOSANQUET, GIRAUD & CO., Paris, have the pleasure of announcing that they have opened an Agency in the City of New York, for the sale of their UNIQUE KNOWN JEWELRY, WATCHES, and for the purpose of making their goods as extensively known as possible, they will, from this time on, sell no more, and have been for over 70 years in Europe, they have determined to introduce them here and not only will they have the advantage of their splendid styles. As a preliminary, they would remark that they manufacture and sell NO IMITATION JEWELRY or WATCHES, but

All are Warranted Gold of the Finest Workmanship.

Our customers will also have the great advantage of a SPLENDID ASSORTMENT OF HERICHESE STYLES and PATTERNS with which we shall keep our New York Establishment.

We have adopted the plan of sale, now so popular, of selling by certificate, and this plan we will invariably be $2 FOR EACH ARTICLE no matter how costly it may be. Upon receipt of enclosing our New York Agency are paid by the sale of Certificates, or Coupons representing the name and article. These Certificates are sold at 25 cents each, or five for $1, and each Certificate, after having been put in separate articles in order is entitled to, on payment of an additional $2. If a Certificate is drawn for which the party holding the holder will oblige us, when he returns the Certificate, to send us $2 and receive the article drawn, which we also may prefer, and it will be sent with pleasure. OUR AIM IS PLEASANT, and every means in our end will be exerted. We solicit a trial from every one who reads this notice, as we are confident of giving the utmost satisfaction.

THE STOCK COMPRISES,

Amongst other articles, Gold and Silver Watches, Gold and Silver Watches, Rings set with Diamonds, Rubies, Pearls, Emeralds, Turquoise Solitaire and Cluster Pins, Ladies' Sets of Jewelry, comprising Pins and Earrings, and the most Elegant Styles, as in Precious Stones of every variety, together with a large assortment of Gold, Silver and Plated Goods, Opera and Marine Glasses, Some of the most beautiful patterns, Gents' Bosom and Scarf Pins. We point with pride to our Post Office Orders where they can be obtained, or by Bank Draft to our New York Agency, and all communications will be conducted by Magnificent Sale!

Gold and Silver Watches, Jewelry, etc., etc.

THE ONE DOLLAR PLAN.

The ENTIRE STOCK of one Gold and Silver Watch Manufactory, two Immense Jewelry Establishments, one Musical Instrument and Sewing Machine Warehouse, one Silver Plating Warehouse, one Gold Pen and Pencil Maker, to be disposed of with dispatch,

WITHOUT REGARD TO COST.

The Goods are of fashionable styles and most excellent workmanship, and are manufactured in this manner to relieve the proprietors from embarrassment occasioned by a distressing war. It should be prominently stated, also, that they are mostly of

AMERICAN MANUFACTURE,

and therefore greatly superior to the goods imported from abroad, besides saving all the immense duties on importation. To facilitate the sale, will be charged for any article on our list, and this sum the purchaser need not pay until he knows what he is to get. Take plan complete with the method recently become so popular for disposing of large stocks of Jewelry and similar productions.

ONLY ONE DOLLAR

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE.

The name of each article offered for sale—as Gold Hunting Watch, Gold Cased Lever Watch, Gent's Breastpin and Ear Drops, Gold Enameled Ring, Silver-plated Chain, &c., &c.—is printed on a card and mixed in a sealed envelope; these envelopes are then placed in a box and well stirred. Then as we receive orders, to-read, and 25 cents for a rare postage and charges, one of the envelopes is taken from the box and forwarded by the first mail to the customer, who will see at once what he is to get for ONE DOLLAR. As the profits on this enormous, he can forward the money according to the direction on the certificate, or not, as he may choose. If the article forwarded should be unsuited to the purchaser, he can exchange, as we keep the privilege of the purchaser to a young man who could not wear them, and had the privilege to exchange. Do-we would select articles from the same department of the catalogue of equal price which may be preferred.

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year [illegible], by Frank Leslie, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 537—Vol. XXI.] NEW YORK, JANUARY 13, 1866. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1 00

"American Enterprise."—The Decline of American Commerce.

Of all idle, empty boasts, that which exalts what is called American commercial enterprise is among the most absurd. In no respect is our vain-glory more pronounced than in our constant gabble about the superior intelligence and enterprise of our "merchant princes." On what do our pretensions in this respect rest? A survey of the commerce of the two American, and of the means of communication and intercourse between the various countries composing them, will furnish the best answer.

Let us first take Mexico, our nearest neighbor. In 1835 the commercial exchanges between the United States and that country amounted in round numbers to $20,000,000. In 1860, before the war, which therefore could not have produced the diminution, our trade had fallen to $8,700,000, while the total commerce of the country was upwards of $54,000,000. Of this England had $33,400,000! "And yet," as has been truly observed, "England, to secure this preponderance of trade, had to pass by our very doors, almost within our own territory."

Next, south of Mexico lie the States of Central America. Taking the direct trade of Great Britain with those States, that is to say that carried on in British vessels, sailing direct between British and Central American ports, and consequently exclusive of that passing the Isthmus of Panama, we find that, for 1860, it amounted to upwards of $7,000,000, while that of the United States was little over $1,000,000! The total trade of all countries with Central America in 1859 was $12,214,000, so that the United States may be said to enjoy less than 8 per cent. of the commerce with that region, of which it should possess the greater portion.

Without going into a special notice of our trade with each State, let us tabulate the totals as regards South America:

Trade with United States.		With all Countries.
New Granada, 1858,	$4,798,000	$16,230,000
Venezuela, "	4,869,000	12,236,000
Ecuador, "	13,700	5,349,000
Peru, "	1,686,000	25,968,000
Bolivia, "	27,000	2,762,000
Chile, 1864,	2,300,000	46,199,000
Argentine Rep. 1858,	5,659,000	39,939,000
Uruguay, "	1,200,000	14,890,000
Paraguay "	None.	1,616,000
Brazil, "	21,900,000	132,421,000
	$40,436,700	$299,527,000

About forty millions in a total of a little less than three hundred millions! But this is not the worst; ours is a diminishing commerce with these countries. It is less, by more than one-third, what it was ten years ago. And how, asks the startled reader, is this to be accounted for? Partly, we answer, from the neglect of our Government to foster and facilitate American enterprise, but mainly from the decay and corruption of that enterprise at home.

As regards the Government. As a general rule it sends out to the Spanish-American States, as Ministers and Consuls, a class of wretched, broken-down hacks of politicians, whose chief recommendation, in most cases, is that they have been defeated in their candidacy for the House of Representatives or the Senate, and must, therefore, be "provided for." Rejected by their own constituency, who may be presumed to know them best, they become pensioners on the Government, with little or no regard to their qualifications. In nine cases out of ten they neither know or care anything about the history or condition of the countries to which they are accredited, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred are ignorant of the language of the people among whom it is supposed the are to spread the influence and extend the interests of they United States. Without, consequently, any true appreciation of what they ought to do, or unable from lack of proper qualifications to do it, they often become ennuied and fall into habits which debase their own character and discredit the United States. Instead of studying the resources and capabilities of the countries in which they reside, and supplying their government and countrymen with information whereon to found a policy or justify intelligent action, they idle away their time, and give faint signs of life only when the day comes round for drawing their quarter's salary.

Partly in consequence of default of data, arising from this cause, and partly because the West and South have never, up to this time, fairly valued the general advantages of foreign commerce, and have narrowly supposed that efforts at its extension were only selfish expedients of the Eastern and Middle States, the Governmental policy has been one of inaction if not indifference. By refusing subsidies to lines of steamers, and by declining to establish and extend postal facilities, by faults of omission rather than of commission, the Government has literally thrown the trade and travel of the continent into foreign, and chiefly British, hands. The lines from here to Panama, and thence to California, only escaped the same direction through a paltry postal subsidy grudgingly bestowed.

It is true there has lately been some reform in this respect, as witness the Brazilian and Sandwich Islands and China lines, which reform, it is to be hoped, does not cease with these.

The principal cause of our commercial decline, however, consists in the demoralization of our merchants themselves. Dazzled with the prospect of immediate gain, and absorbed with the idea of speedily realizing fortunes outside the old, well-tried and successful methods, in which intelligent enterprise was backed up by steady application and patient industry, and through which new fields and sources of wealth were opened or created, they have become infected with the mania which Wall street has inspired, and are more ready for gambling adventures holding out the possibility of wealth within a twelvemonth, than for those legitimate undertakings which promise insure not only wealth but an honorable name, besides supplying a perennial source of national prosperity, within as many years. Where now do we find our people establishing those houses as those which gave the American merchants a name and position, second to those of no other country, in China, India, the North-west and South-west coasts of the continent, in Mexico, Brazil and on the La Plata? The men who laid deep and strong the foundations of a national commerce are gradually dying out, but their successors do not rise up to "call them blessed." Their sons and grandsons prefer the unhealthy atmosphere and speculative excitements of our great cities, and the fever of the stock market to the apprentice-ship of ten years in Shanghai or Rio, through means of which their predecessors acquired the business experience, judgment, and general knowledge, as well as the wealth that qualified for them the title of merchant princes. They have not only degenerated, but become demoralized to such a degree that, in their madness of greed, they do not hesitate to gamble away the patient accumulations of their fathers, and incur dishonor and the risks of the Penitentiary. We need not refer to more than one notable example which the last twelvemonth has afforded.

Let those conversant with the business affairs and the business men of this city for twenty years past, recall the chance that was taken place, and reflect who were the men who gave dignity and weight to the name of the American merchant, and by whom they have been supplanted? Men of wealth we admit it is true, but how, as a rule, was that wealth acquired, and how is it held and used? Through fraudulent contracts in some instances, through combinations in which capital was not unscrupulously used to destroy honest enterprises or rob them from the hands of those who had carried them to the verge of success, through speculations in stocks, running "opositions," not in the public interest, but to compel legitimate companies to buy worthless steamers at extravagant prices, through grinding extortion, and the worst of accumulations when a monopoly was once established, and through all manner of devices from which the honorable and truly public-spirited man would shrink, and allied to fraud? They are not the men to seek out carefully and intelligently new fields of commerce or develop those already open. They add nothing to the general wealth, but live by devouring each other, and consuming the accumulations of the weak and laborious. Their property, apparent or real, is a bubble, and a snare to young men, and excites the old to relinquish their legitimate pursuits, slow of profit, for the dangerous avenues of reckless and unscrupulous speculation. "Death on Marshal's baton," was the cry of the soldier under the Empire, and "make or break" has become the motto of what is called "business" in New York. Not in New York alone, for the baneful influence of Wall street is pervading every part of the country, and gambling in grain in Chicago is as rife as gambling in stocks in Broad street.

Meanwhile more prudent and far-seeing Englishmen are quickly monopolizing the sources whence wealth flows, and turning every rill of trade into the great stream which flows in a golden current on her shores. Her capitalists are slowly obtaining control of even our own more important and profitable public works, and carrying abroad the gains that should be distributed here. And yet, in face of all the facts and circumstances we have recounted, men wonder how it is that American trade is declining, and American commercial influence falling away!

THE "generous sentiments" of the President are dead things. Beauregard says that they have induced him, "together with many other confederate officers and soldiers to remain in Louisiana." All lies were for Louisiana.

The Iron-clad Revolution.

THERE is a Nemesis that follows ever on Wrong. It has always been the pride and boast of Great Britain that she ruled the seas, and that since Trafalgar her will on almost any nation possessing a seacoast. The pride was real, the boast not empty. She wrested Gibraltar from Spain, sealed up France during the great Napoleonic wars, and later, hemmed in Russia with her sea-legions. Her ships worked her will in India and China, and wherever else, and on whatever pretext, she chose to exercise it. There was but one nation on earth that had the means, not alone for the construction of ships, but, what is of more consequence, to furnish men to man them, that could cope with her the supremacy of the seas, and that nation occupied with commerce, considering itself safe from aggression, with no revenges to gratify or ambition of territorial aggrandizement to realise, was content to limit her war-marine to the simple necessities of its position. It spent no monstrous sums to create an imposing navy, but left to the enterprise of its officers the task of making and testing improvements, within modest limits, and at moderate cost. If it watched closely what was doing abroad, it was only to make its own action a stride in advance of what might be achieved there, and with a perfect confidence that the ingenuity, skill, and daring of its people could always be counted upon for improvement. It was not a champion in conflicts, but a spectator intelligently interested, and ready to profit from what it heard or saw.

Up to the breaking out of the late war, the nation had done next to nothing in the way of making iron-clad vessels. It, or rather its representatives in the department of naval warfare, remembering that power of offence might be increased, pari passu, with power of resistance, thought it wiser to dedicate themselves to the improvement to attach, as more in consonance with the spirit of the people than efforts directed to resist. It devoted itself to the creation of means to destroy, not to defend. Hence its study to the perfection of artillery, rather than to the piling on of iron plating. When the news came that England or France had succeeded in protecting their vessels so as to be impregnable to existing guns, the quiet Yankee set himself to work to produce guns that would demolish their boasted means of resistance. His was the more economical way to the solution of the great naval problem, for which, if nothing else, it is to be hoped Europe will give him credit. Europe piled on her plating, until her ships, stupidly encumbered after precedent, could barely stagger along her shores, and became utterly incapable of sailing to distant seas. America more than kept pace in her line of improvement, so that when the war broke out, there was not a single iron-clad in existence that could live before the guns of Dahlgren, Parrott and Rodman. Their massive shot defied resistance, and all European improvements in protecting ships were more than counterbalanced by the American improvement in ordnance.

Our war came on, and England lost not a moment in constructing iron-clad ships of all sorts. The war became, partly under her fostering care, a real struggle of the giants. Then, for the first time, the question of ironclads was brought before the American people in a practical form, and both North and South hastened to solve it, under the light of their more early and less trammelled intelligence. Neither wasted time in trying to adapt the old wooden vessels to the altered conditions which the use of iron as a protection imposed. One cut down the "Merrimac" to the water's edge, to diminish draft and lessen exposure, and covered it with a roof of iron, the resistance of which was more than doubled in effect, because the roof was made sloping, so as to glance off the shot. The other made its model iron-clad with the least possible exposure above water, and where exposed with the greatest resisting power possible, and placed on it a revolving turret, within which heavy guns could be trained on a foe without the delay, difficulty and danger of manœuvring the vessel so as to bring its guns "to bear." The experience of the war shows that the originality and ingenuity of the North were an overmatch for those of the South. Not a vessel constructed in the South survived an action with the vessels constructed in the North. Not a single "Monitor" was ever penetrated by artillery, and some of them were exposed, as in Charleston harbor, to a concentrated fire before which none but the Monitors could have lived for half an hour.

In face of this experience and with a conceit which defies all attempts at teaching, the English and French go on constructing ironclads substantially on the model of their old wooden hulks, as if altered conditions (as we have already said) did not require corresponding changes to meet them.

Russia, however (and here Nemesis comes in), has a hide-bound Czar, full of conceit, with a quicker appreciation of actualities, has lost no time in availing herself of the lessons taught, and the experience gained through the American war. Quietly but surely she has built an iron-clad fleet, made up mostly of Monitors, which to-day is more than a match for that of England, and which, for defensive purposes, is invincible against that of England and France combined.

Had it not been for the proportions assumed by the rebellion, and which were due wholly to the part taken by the great British American ingenuity and skill might never have been directed toward the solution of the question of armored vessels. Great Britain gave it that direction, and the result has established American supremacy on the ocean. The "wooden walls" of England are of no further avail. Her maritime supremacy is at an end. The political power that can command a few millions of dollars can create a defensive squadron that can laugh at all the fleets England can send into its waters. In endeavoring to divide, conquer and destroy the United States, Great Britain has sounded the knell of her maritime greatness. She no longer "rules the waves." Even Russia is her peer on the water. Verily there is a Nemesis in all things!

A Word to the Wise.

We have often wondered, personally, to think that during the holidays, when all the world is cudgelling its brains to think of something that will be pleasant and original as a present, that more persons do not settle on that simple yet really grateful gift of a year's subscription to a good newspaper. We do not promulgate this as an original idea, but simply as one of those stereotyped facts that will appear to every one who is at all a thinker. The idea of a year of newspapers—one coming regularly into the household every week—is a means of economy and economy alive that no other gift can hope to compete with. The sum of money so expended is small, very small when compared with what any ordinarily liberal person would feel called on in purchasing a gift, and has the satisfaction not only of being a gift to the benefactor of the giver, but at the end of the year of being a fair volume to be treasured among the home circle for ever.

In saying all this we are, of course, selfish, and desirous of reminding those who really wish to enjoy a good paper, that none can be found equal in all its departments to FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. For the sum of $4, remitted by mail to this office, the person who will receive 52 numbers of a large paper, which, during the year, will contain about 1,600 engravings and a corresponding reading matter, and in the end will bind into a volume of 832 pages.

We feel that we cannot say more than this.

NOTWITHSTANDING the two great reservoirs of Croton water in the Park, and the distributing reservoir in the city, the requirements of New York are not yet satisfied. A new one is to be built at Manhattanville, near Washington Heights, to supply water to parts of the city that cannot be supplied by existing reservoirs. A plot of ground has been selected between 130th and 135th streets, 10th avenue and Harlem river, embracing 35 acres, for the above purpose. From this water will be carried so high that it can be distributed to the most elevated points on Manhattan Island. A pumping apparatus will be employed to force the water into the reservoir and also into a tank on the top of the tower. The extreme height of the tank will be about 230 feet above the tide level. One-tenth of all the pumping will hereafter live in New York, and to whom water can be sent from the reservoirs now built, will be provided for by the new works.

An attempt is making, but not prospering, to preserve Bunhill Fields Cemetery, London, from the "encroaching hand of improvement." In it are buried De Foe, author of Robinson Crusoe, Bunyan, author of Pilgrim's Progress, Isaac Watts, the poet, and numerous other world-wide celebrities. It is not unlikely that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners will move into possession of the land, and it is by no means improbable that they may consider themselves justified in disposing of it on building leases, so that the very graves of men who have done so much for Great Britain may be ravaged, and the bones of Bunyan, which, when in life, had little rest, be cast out again. De Foe, whose Robinson Crusoe has done more for England and the world in promoting maritime adventure, and all the fortune that has followed it, than a dozen ministers of state could achieve even if they lived for a century each, may be turned out of his narrow bed. We earnestly trust this infamy may be spared; infamous it would indeed be if the delight of seven generations of men and boys moved them not to spare to his bones the perpetual use of that grave which was bought 134 years ago, under the impression that no one would wrong the dead.

THE total production of charcoal and pig iron in the United States, in 1864, was 255,486 tons. There were 39 rolling mills in the country in the same year, making 335,369 tons, but having a capacity of making 732,000 tons.

WE quote the following significant lines from the report of the Secretary of War:

"The military appropriations by the last Congress amounted to the sum of five hundred and sixteen millions two hundred and forty thousand one hundred and thirty-one dollars and seventy cents ($516,240,131 70). The military estimates for the next fiscal year, after careful revision, amount to thirty-three millions eight hundred and fourteen thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars and eighty-three cents ($33,814,461 83). The national military force on the 1st of May, 1865, numbered one million five hundred and sixteen men. It is proposed to reduce the military establishment to fifty thousand troops, and over eight hundred thousand have already been mustered out of service."

A BOLD banter has been make in Wilkes's Spirit of the Times to run the Californian horse Norfolk against Gladiateur, the victor of the British and French turf, for $100,000 in gold, both horses to come to New York. This would involve a voyage of 11 days for Gladiateur, and one of 30 days for Norfolk. A writer in the Spirit of the Times says that if Gladiateur will accept the challenge, and win the race, he can gain money enough to have his statue cast, life size, in solid gold.

IN addition to the various proposed amendments of the Constitution which have been brought before Congress, is one submitted by Mr. Stewart, Senator for Nevada, as follows:

"1st. The Union of the States, under this constitution is indissoluble, and no State can absolve its citizens from the obligation of paramount allegiance to the United States.

"2d. No engagement made, or obligation incurred by any State, or by any number of States, or by any county, city, or any other municipal corporation, to subvert, impair, or resist the authority of the United States, or to support or aid any legislative convention or body in hostility to such authority, shall ever be held, voted, or be assumed or sustained, in whole or part, by any State or by the United States."

THE decree of the tool of the Emperor Napoleon, in Mexico, establishing peonage, which is only another form of slavery, has elicited a complaint, or remonstrance, to headquarters in Paris, from Mr. Seward, to which, however, the French despot has vouchsafed no answer. We are not informed if Mr. Seward has renewed his complaint, nor can we find out what he proposes to do in case it be treated with "silent contempt." Suppose he should request Gen. Grant to countersign it, thus—"R. S. V. P., U. S. G." We believe an answer would come without unnecessary delay.

THE London Daily News is not more surprised than are Mr. Buchanan's countrymen that he should write a book, attempting to vindicate his conduct as President during the last year of his administration. The facts of that year are so recent and patent, that no effort to misrepresent or color them, to suit a purpose, can be made successfully, and Mr. Buchanan's book is open to refutation from the recollections of every citizen of the land. The temerity that seeks to dispel the clouds of obscurity that have settled around Wheatland is only adequately punished by the reiteration of the stern sentence already pronounced by an outraged and betrayed people against the cowardice and imbecility of James Buchanan. The President who avows solemnly that a nation may be so involved in formulas that it has no longer the right or ability to live, had better, when his term of office expires, avoid recalling himself to his countrymen.

TOWN GOSSIP.

WE remember of a vengeful individual, who, in the exuberance of his rage at some one who offended him, said:

"I'll have revenge! I'll do something terrible! By Jove, I'll give his little boy a tin horn."

In the same spirit we cannot help saying: "Thank heaven the holidays are over, for now we will have no more tin horns until next year."

It is only about holiday time that we really believe that Carlyle was right when he declared that the proper use for boys was to put them in a barrel as soon as they were born, and feed them through the bunghole until they were 17 years old. Then we presume their education would be considered finished, and they were to be released.

But to the subject of tin horns. This execrable custom is one of modern invention, having only been known to the rising generation of bad little boys for the last five or six years. Who was the first inventor or originator of it, history does not tell. We wish it did, that we might hold up his name to eternal infamy. The custom is for every youth of every age, who can raise a ten cent stamp, and the wind to blow it, to buy a tin horn the day before Christmas, which horn he perpetually doth blow from that time until the day after New Year's, when the horn marvellously disappears, and is no more seen among men—or boys. Of all the intolerable nuisances that ever greeted the human ear, the tin horn nuisance is the worst. It has, to people of nervous temperament, made the holidays a time of terror. Imagine a newspaper writer sitting down to concoct his next day's articles for the press with a concert of tin horns under his window, performed by six young demons in jackets and trowsers, kept up without intermission for perhaps eight hours on a stretch. Delightful, isn't it.

To speak earnestly, we cannot imagine a more senseless, annoying custom than this tin horn business, and we cannot help expressing our wonder that the police do not take the law in their own hands and confiscate them. We have waited in hope for years that some law would be passed in our City Councils making it fineable to sell or blow one of them, the same as laws have been made to abate other nuisances; but the day of deliverance seems deferred, therefore we can only wait and pray that ere another year goes by some philanthropist of our Aldermen or Councilmen who believes in peace and quietness will take the matter in hand and by enactment squelch tin-horn-ism. Whoever it may be, we promise to start a subscription to raise a monument in his honor.

All holidays bring with them especial dissipation, and consequently crime, but those just past have been especially prolific in that way. Shooting is the favorite line of business, and within the week we have had a few cases of it that rather stagger one's belief in civilization.

One case is that of a young gentleman of that City of Churches, Brooklyn, Russ by name, who has reversed the order of things, which seem to be pretty well established since the days of Mary Harris, of Washington notoriety, and took to shooting a young lady, Miss Dayton, who refused to marry him, and though he did not succeed in killing her instantly, her chances for death are very strong. Like all cases of the kind, each party has its story, and each their believers. The young man declares that the lady has treated him with ingratitude and trifled with him, while the lady says that she never promised to marry him, and regarded his attentions only as those of a friend.

Now young ladies should understand that, as society is at present constituted, this having gentlemen friends who pay their board, find them in clothes and knick-knacks, is dangerous. To our eyes it looks very much as though the lady in question had made use of Russ, or his pocket, as long as she could, and when he urged the issue upon her of matrimony tried to throw him off relentlessly. That she must have been for a long time aware of his love and his hopes is without doubt, and having been so, she was criminal to allow it to proceed by offering the encouragement of accepting aid from him. If a lady accepts the assistance of a gentleman, it should be to enable her to earn a living, but not take pecuniary aid. Any departure from this rule will inevitably entail trouble.

Another shooting case in Brooklyn which shows the folly, or something worse of human nature, occurred in this wise. A Mr. Smith, a storekeeper, on Christmas Eve, counted over his money in his store just before leaving, in the presence of several of his friends and some strangers, and making up a package of $1,200 put it in his pocket to carry home, and in spite of the warnings of his friends, started off unarmed. One of his friends who carried a revolver went with him to his house, and there left him, still offering the loan of the pistol, which was refused. At midnight Mr. Smith was roused from his slumbers by a voice demanding:

"Your money or your life!"

His wife entreated him to be still, as by the pale light in the room she could see that it was a robber with blackened face and a revolver pointed at her husband. This Smith would not do, but sprang up to grapple with the robber, who fired, and making a grasp for the package of money which was under Smith's pillow, jumped from the window and escaped, leaving Smith a dying man.

It will no doubt be considered harsh when we pronounce this a case of self-murder, but we can view it in no other light.

The only sensation in theatrical matters for the week has been the adding of a new theatre to the list of New York. Miss Lucy Rushton, who will be remembered as making a debut at the Olympic some months since, and playing a short engagement, has got up in the space of sixteen days a new theatre. Now, though we do positively object to our established idea on the subject of theatres being so overthrown as to be brought to the belief that they can be got up in sixteen days, yet we cannot help bowing to the necessity and admitting that the thing can be done.

On Saturday, the 23d of December, Miss Lucy Rushton opened what she calls the New York Theatre, located on the site of the Unitarian Church, lately the Athenæum, on Broadway just opposite the New York Hotel, and between Fourth st. and Astor place, on the east side of the street. There she proposes to give New York the drama, in such shape as it chooses to have it, and in a limited way fill her pocket, which she is sure to do as far as the capacity of the house goes, which is not far. We cannot conscientiously say much for the new house. It is small and not gorgeously fitted up. The stage is very limited and so is the company, though among the latter are some good names which New Yorkers will hail with pleasure. That the new theatre will be a success is hardly worth while to say, as anything in the shape of a theatre in New York must be a success now, financially speaking.

At the Academy of Music during the week we have had two representations from the French Company, under the management of M. Paul Juignet and M. Drivet. The first came off on Wednesday, the 27th of December, when Le Bataille de Dames, a comedy in three acts, and Le Fille de Dominique, in one act, were given. The performances and the company met with an enthusiastic reception, and the general arrangement was of such a description as will, without doubt, enable the directors to continue a series of representations. On Saturday, the 30th, they gave Les Premieres Arms de Richelieu and La Partie de Piquet, both of that sparkling French school that keeps the mind alive continually, and, coupled with good acting and good costumes, makes as fair a dramatic evening as can be enjoyed anywhere.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—An elopement from Indianapolis, which took place a couple of months ago, has borne disagreeable fruit. A young and headstrong daughter of one of the "first families" persisted, despite the protests and entreaties of her parents, in marrying a handsome but rather wild young blade. She eloped, married, returned, was reconciled, discovered an incompatibility of temper, was divorced, and is again in the bosom of her family, in the brief period of two months. Rather a rapid experience, even in this fast age, for a young Miss in her "teens."

—— A New York policeman overhauled a couple of young bloods wending their way home at a late hour, and amusing themselves in passing down Broadway, by upsetting ash-barrels in the street. He gave them their choice, either to shovel the ashes back into the barrels or go to the station-house. "No station-house for us," said the youngsters, and accordingly set to work, the policeman standing by to witness their labor. One did the work very reluctantly; the other in the best-natured manner possible. He politely demanded the officer's number, remarking that possibly some day he might require a recommendation to the Street Department.

—— The number of males in the United States is 13,685,854 against 13,004,372 females, showing 681,462 excess of males, according to the census of 1860; so that there is now more than a man to every woman in spite of the loss by the war.

—— Martha's Vineyard is the pride of the Massachusetts people. In the whole country there is no place where liquor is sold openly (very thirsty persons may get it by private contract); the court meets and has nothing to do; lawyers don't flourish.

—— Bayard Taylor is writing a novel, which has for the hero an American tourist. The New York correspondent of a western paper gives this account of the plot: "The gentleman falls in love with an Italian beauty, he accidently meets at Rome, in the atelier of an artist for whom she was sitting as a model. The romantic lover is separated from his divinity again and again; but, at last, after a variety of adventures and romantic experiences, is wedded to her, and the tale ends most felicitously, as it usually does, in the story-books designed for the edification of good little children. There are some art criticisms in the volume that are mentioned favorably by those who have seen the manuscript."

—— Mr. Pollard, the former editor of the Richmond Examiner, and the rebel historian of the late rebellion, proposes to write a new history of the war, which, with felicitous adaptation to circumstances, he entitles "The Lost Cause." He is getting subscriptions to the work throughout the South.

—— The New York Central Railroad has thirty thousand dollars invested in little brass baggage-checks. Thirty thousand pieces of baggage are sometimes checked at Albany in a single month.

—— The Academy of Sciences in Chicago has determined to erect a new building at Cottage Grove.

—— Mary Sawyer, a young lady of Oldtown, Me., was drowned, one day last week. She had been visiting, across the river, and started to go home, in company with a young man on skates, who drew her on a sled, but skated on a hole and drew her after him. He got up on the ice and gave his hand to the young lady, to help her out, when his glove came off and she was carried under the ice and drowned.

—— A tailor was robbed of $1,300 in Cincinnati, Ohio. He accosted an acquaintance in the street about it. No reply. Result—arrest and imprisonment. Soon after the thief and the money was found, and the tailor excused the previous arrest for the reason that the gentleman refused to reply, and thus excited suspicion. A suit for false imprisonment follows.

—— A certain judge in Anne Arundel county, Maryland, who probably had not heard of the proclamation of emancipation, and perhaps not the war, recently sentenced a colored woman to be sold into slavery for two years.

—— Mr. Samuel Bowles mentions as an excellent feature of banquets at San Francisco, the serving of hot beef tea, with just a smack of claret in it, as a constant refreshment during the evening.

—— A grape grower on an island in Lake Erie asserts that he has raised this year, from one acre, 18½ tons of Catawba grapes. This acre equaled a California placer.

—— A lot of handsome furniture, 21 pieces in all, arrived in Richmond one day last week for Mrs. R. E. Lee, a gift from the ex-rebel ladies of Baltimore.

—— Three respectable, well-to-do men have recently thrown themselves from hotel windows. It ought to be forbidden by law.

—— A Boston firm sent four flour barrels, full of letters, to the post-office, one day last week, the postage on which amounted to $500.

—— President Johnson has positively declined to accept a carriage made for him by the workmen of the army repair workshop, after their working hours, and it has been purchased by Secretary Stanton.

—— Joe and Bill Benton went to New Orleans with a flat boat of corn. Joe writes to his father thus—"Nu Orleens, Gune 5—Dear Dad markets is dull and corn mighty lo and Bills dead. J. B."

—— One of the largest farmers in the United States is Mr. Bidwell, of California, the Chairman of the Committee of Agriculture in the House of Representatives. He owns 25,000 acres of land, and last year his wheat crop was 38,000 bushels.

—— As a specimen of what can be accomplished by the employment of freedmen, Col. J. J. Williams, a planter of Florida, states that with a force of about 100 colored hands he raised during last year from 200 to 250 bales of cotton, each bale weighing 500 pounds.

—— On Thanksgiving Day, a young lady at Westboro, Mass., after a short acquaintance, married a returned soldier. On the following morning the young bride donned her cloak and bonnet, and evading her husband's questions as to where she was going, left the house, and took the next train of cars out of town. She has not since been heard from.

—— A letter from Pit Hole City, Pa., speaks of crime as still rampant there. The quietly disposed inhabitants generally stay at home after dark, as it is dangerous to travel the streets at night. A few days since the Post-office was broken open, and the letters therein robbed of money, drafts, &c., of the estimated value of $250,000.

Foreign.—Glasgow, Scotland, is to be "improved," and 24,480 persons will be turned out of their homes by the operation. This number does not include a goodly population who will be removed by the proposed alteration of 12 streets to be widened.

—— A paper called the Flying Dragon Reporter, has just been started in London. It is to be printed in Chinese characters, and will be circulated in China.

—— The wettest place in the world is Cheerrapoorjee, situated in the Kossya hills, situated 20 miles from Calcutta. The rain fall at that spot is upward of 600 inches in the year, or 20 times that of the very worst climate of Western Ireland.

—— Near Chico, in Northern California, is the grave of a rich citizen, buried upon his own farm, whose monument bears this inscription, written by himself: "Thomas M. Wright, lived and died an atheist, fearing no hell, hoping for no heaven—a friend and advocate of mental liberty."

—— A London letter writer says the English ladies' fashion of dressing the hair is becoming; those two enormous rolls of rats and hair, which surmounted each temple, and made putting on a bonnet an impossibility, have become extinct, and the excrescence which gave such ovenlike appearance to the back of the neck, is fast disappearance. In its place the ladies have adopted a small roll of their own hair which is bound by a gilt band and adorned with ribbons. The hair in front is crinkled and falls over the forehead in little curls.

—— The following toast was given at the St. Nicholas banquet recently; "Holland—Land of Dykes and Van Dykes, of brooks and Ten Brooks, of pools and Vander Pools, of schooners and Schoonmakers; land of cities with euphoneous names of Saadam and Edam, and Amsterdam and Rotterdam; land of cider and Zyder-Zees; proprietor of bottom land on the largest known European scale. Broad-based Holland, hail."

—— The ear-rings given to a Russian bride in London cost $40,000.

—— A ballet queen, in Paris, Mdlle. Schlosser, famous for beauty and dissipation, has just died at the age of 27.

—— An incident took place during a party invited by the Venerie de l'Empereur, to shoot over the preserves of the forest of Valence en Brie, near Fontainbleau. Among the sportsmen was the young Marquis de Lignery, a boy of 19. The Master of the Hounds, Gen. Lefort, followed his dogs into a cover of brushwood, when M. Lignery, believing that they had found a buck, fired twice, his gun being loaded with No. 4 shot, the whole contents lodging in the unfortunate general's body. He is literally covered with wounds. With great difficulty, in consequence of his intense sufferings, Gen. Lefort was conveyed to his residence in town, Rue de Crillon. Whether he will recover appears doubtful.

—— The extraordinary case of Mrs. Janetta Horton Ryves, who claims to be entitled to £15,000, left her by George III. "as a recompense for some trouble she may have experienced through her father," the late Duke of Cumberland, is shortly to be tried by an English special jury. Mrs. Ryves is now living in poverty, but some friends, who are assured of the justice of her claims, have subscribed money to enable her to presecute them. The marriage of her mother, Olive Wilmot (afterwards Mrs. Serres), with the duke is attested, on undoubted authority, and the legacy of George III. is equally undoubted; but some years since the Prerogative Court of Canterbury refused probate, on the ground that there was no precedent in England for proving a monarch's will. Eminent counsel are engaged, and the trial will excite no little interest.

—— It has been calculated that vendors of roasted chestnuts, to the number of 400, arrive in Paris, from the south of France, in the course of the month of September, and that each of them sells, on an average, 40 bags of chestnuts, weighing 100 kilogrammes each. The bag of chestnuts costs about 33 francs, and is resold in Paris at from 50 to 54 francs, leaving a profit of from 17 to 21 francs. The vendor contrives, out of this small profit to defray the expenses of his journey, to pay rent, and maintain himself during the winter.

—— A correspondent at Havana says: "A young man, the manager of an estate, was crossing a river on horseback, and followed by a bulldog, when the howling of the animal caused him to turn his head. What was his surprise to see an alligator, at least nine feet long, carrying off the dog by the neck? To jump off his horse into the water, to attack the monster with his hunting-knife, was the work of a moment. His boldness was successful, for he killed the alligator and saved his dog."

MAKING A CHIEF AMONG THE CLABLUMS.

ON Vancouver's Island, a spot that is fast yielding to the foot of the white man, and destined in a little time to be a great commercial point, is a race of Indians called the Clablums. A Mr. Kane, a Canadian artist, has lately visited them, and gives this account of the making a new chief, a mode of election that has this advantage over the vote by ballot, that it is more summary. He says:

Close neighbors to Victoria on Vancouver's Island are the Clablum Indians, a Flathead tribe who have a village on the opposite side of the harbor. They have a peculiar breed of small dogs with long hair. The dogs are bred for the sake of this hair, which is shorn, beaten with goosedown and white earth, twisted by running into threads, and woven upon a rude hand-loom into blankets. The artist sketched Cheaclach, the chief, of whose inauguration he had this account. When Cheaclach's father was too old to govern, the son was dismissed for 30 days—fasting and dreaming in the mountains. At the end of the thirty days a feast was made by the villagers, into which the new chief rushed from his fasting, wild with spiritual exultation. He seized a small dog and began devouring it alive, that being the customary first act of the coronation ceremony. The tribe then collected about him, singing and dancing in the wildest manner, and while they danced he rushed at those whom he loved best, and bit their bare shoulders and arms. To be thus bitten was regarded as a high mark of distinction, especially by those from whom there was a piece of flesh bitten out and swallowed.

These Indians, among other superstitions, believe that if they can bury a hair from their enemy's head together with a living frog, whatever torment the frog suffers will be shared by the head that grew the hair. They believe also that they are in the power of any enemy who finds their spittle, and if they spit on the ground, most carefully obliterate the marks, but commonly spit on their own clothes for safety sake.

BATTLE OF TONGUE RIVER.

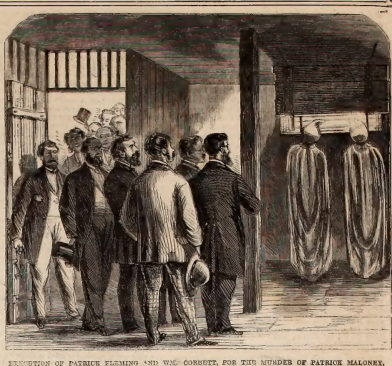
WE present, in this number, a sketch of the battle of Tongue River, fought on the morning of August 29, by the United States forces commanded by Brig.-Gen. P. E. Connor and the Arrapahoe Indians under their chief "Medicine Man." "I. M. W.," the special correspondent of the Chicago Times with Gen. Connor writes:

"On the evening of August 28th Gen. Connor left his camp on Tongue River, Dacotah Territory, at the head of 150 picked men from the 2d California, 11th Ohio and 7th Iowa cavalry regiments, and Capt. North's Pawnee Indian scouts. Making a forced march of 60 miles he was in sight of the Arrapahoes' camp at sunrise, when he drew his men up in line and gave positive orders against killing women and children or scalping, and then opened the fight by a charge on the camp. The Indians fought bravely and held their ground for nearly two hours, when they broke and retreated up the river, leaving 60 dead warriors on the ground and taking a large number with them.

"At this stage of the fight the Pawnees flatly refused to join the pursuit, but fell to plundering, yet the remaining 70 men pressed on after the retreating Indians. The horses were so nearly exhausted that a party of 14, consisting of Gen. Connor, his staff, and a few other officers who were well mounted, left their companions far in the rear and followed on 15 miles, when a party of 300 Indians turned upon them and offered fight. The little party stood its ground amid a perfect shower of bullets until every member of the General's staff was wounded. Capt. Jewett, his aide-de-camp, was shot in the leg with a bullet and through the hand with an arrow, and his signal officer, bugler and two orderlies were shot in various parts of the body. They were then on a rolling prairie, and knowing that it was sure death to remain in their present position or turn their backs upon the Indians, Gen. Connor ordered seven men to fall back to the next ridge in the rear, and the remainder held the Indians in check while they effected this movement, and then they recovered the retreat of the other seven. In this manner they retreated until five miles back they met those who had fallen behind, and with this reinforcement they charged the Indians and drove them several miles in great confusion and with heavy loss, when the scattering of the Indians and exhaustion of the horses induced the command to return to the captured camp where the Pawnees were enjoying their feast of plunder.

"As a punishment for their cowardly conduct, Gen. Connor took everything from them and piled it together in the centre of the camp, when those that followed him were allowed to select whatever they wished, and the remainder, together with over a hundred tons of dried buffalo meat and an immense stock of valuable furs, provisions, and Indian notions of every description, was committed to the flames. This accomplished, the command remounted, and reached their camp at 8 o'clock the next morning, having, in less than 36 hours, ridden over 150 miles, killed over 100 Indian warriors, and captured 600 horses without unsaddling.

"The band of the Medicine Man has been the terror of the Plains for the last two seasons. Throughout the summer of '64 they were on their career of murder and pillage; but in the fall, professing repentance for their misdeeds, they were received and fed through the winter at Camp Collins and other military posts in this section of country. In the spring they were supplied with everything they needed, and extensively started on a buffalo hunt, but soon turned up on the 'war path,' pursuing their hellish system of warfare on defenceless immigrants and isolated ranches. About the 1st of August they destroyed a train near Fort Halleck, and chaining one of the teamsters to a wagon wheel, piled bacon around his body and burned him to death.



"This is but a fair specimen of the atrocities which they committed, and at the time they were attacked they had over 2,500 horses and an immense amount of plunder of every description, not excepting a large number of scalps taken from men, women and children, and even infants.

"During the fight at their camp one of the Pawnees had thrown a woman down and was about killing her when Capt. O'Brien came along and knocked the fellow over with the butt end of his carbine. The squaw got up and made a sign of gratitude, but as Capt. O'Brien turned to go away, she drew a pocket pistol and shot at him, the ball passing through his coat."

A ROMANTIC young man says that a woman's heart is like the moon—it changes continually, but always has a man in it.

PREPARING PATRICK FLEMING AND WM. CORBETT FOR EXECUTION, AT CHICAGO, FRIDAY, DEC. 15.—FROM SKETCHES BY MR. SLOGWOOD.

EXECUTION OF PATRICK FLEMING AND WM. CORBETT, FOR THE MURDER OF PATRICK MALONEY, AT CHICAGO, DEC. 15.

THE HANGING OF FLEMING AND CORBETT AT CHICAGO.

At three o'clock on Friday, December 15th, Patrick Fleming and William Corbett suffered the extreme penalty of the law, for the murder of Patrick Maloney, about one year ago, at a place called Sand Ridge, about six miles from Chicago.

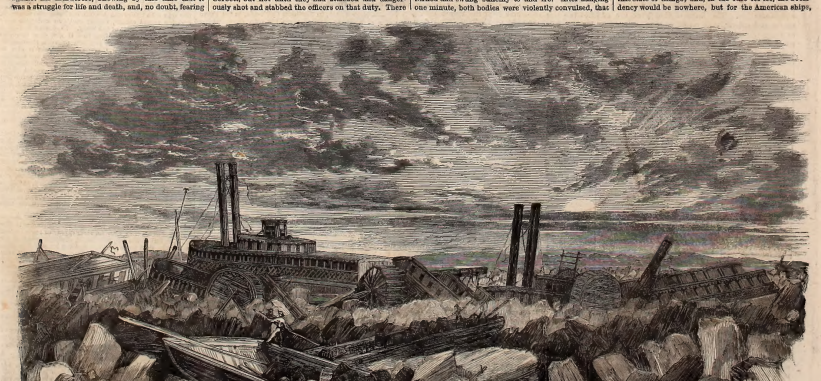
A little more than a year ago, Fleming, Corbett and John Kennedy, all Irishmen, were encountered in a low drinking saloon by a stranger who, it has been averred by Corbett, contracted with them for the assassination of Patrick Maloney. This portion of the affair is involved still in some degree of mystery, as it is not very positive which of the trio named was the responsible party for the execution of the job. At all events the amount they were to receive would have been about $16 each, but they say they have never got even this much, indeed none at all, if we are to believe Fleming and Corbett. The assassination determined upon, its plan was deliberately laid, and in that plan and in the manner in which it was carried out it would seem as if these villains had become so hardened by a career of unpunished vice that they neglected any precautions to guard against detection. On the night of the 29th of November, 1864, the Sunday before Thanksgiving in that year, three murderous scoundrels, enlisted in their service, as their guide to the house of their intended victim, an acquaintance named James Flinn. The four accomplices then went together to Philip Brennan's saloon, No. 117 Canal street, and there hired a hack to go to Sand Ridge.

William Gibbons, the hackman, went far enough with them to point out Maloney's dwelling. They reached the house. Roused from sleep by their loud knocking, Maloney came down to the door and demanded who was there. "A friend," one of their voices replied, and they asked admission. He refused to open the door, and they attempted to force it. Fleming had placed Corbett at the side of the door, with a navy revolver in his hand, with directions to shoot Maloney as soon as he could be seen. The door was partially opened, and Corbett snapped his pistol at the man within. Fleming cursed him for not having his pistol in better order. Maloney now desperately strove to shut the door against his murderers, knowing by this time that it was a struggle for life and death, and, no doubt, fearing more for his wife and little ones, in the event of their entrance, than for himself. Corbett now fired a shot through the door. The pressure against the door from the inside ceased, a body was heard to fall, and a voice cried aloud in agonised tones, "Honors." The pretticed ears of the midnight assassins recognised this as the deathcry of their victim, and one of them exclaiming, "Come along, that will do," they hastily glided away along the fence and disappeared.

For a long time this murder was a mystery, and the police could make nothing of it, but at last a clue was got, and Gibbons, the hackman, was arrested, which was quickly followed by the arrest of Fleming and Corbett, but not until they had attacked and dangerously shot and stabbed the officers on that duty. There did not seem to be a mitigating circumstance in their case, and trial and conviction followed.

At 2 o'clock on the day of execution they were robed in their cells, and led forth, attended by their respective clergymen, to whom they had made full confession and received the last offices of the church. Both were calm and collected, as though only going through some ordinary ceremony, and listened to the reading of the death warrant with unmoved countenances.

The trap fell at 11¼ minutes before 3.



The ropes, suddenly drawn to their utmost tension, gave out a dull "thud," and their elasticity even raised the bodies a little way. Then for an instant, they turned and swung sullenly to and fro. After hanging one minute, both bodies were violently convulsed, that of Fleming most. Half a minute later there was a horrible convulsive shuddering of Fleming's body. It seemed to rise and fall as much as a couple of inches in this fearful death agony. This, however, was the last very severe struggle between the departing spirit and its frail tenement of clay. Three-quarters of a minute later both bodies made a convulsive motion of drawing up the legs, and in a quarter of a minute afterwards Corbett's most violent death-struggle took place—a shudder like that of Fleming, but less severe. To and fro, as if swung by some unseen hand, swayed the now lifeless bodies. All sensation or knowledge of pain on this earth they had now passed for ever, although for as much as a minute later muscular action of both bodies was observable. A step ladder was now raised between them, and at seven minutes before three o'clock Drs. R. L. Rea and J. W. Freer examined the bodies, the former that of Corbett and the latter that of Fleming, and found that all pulsation had ceased, and life was extinct. Both necks were dislocated, as well they might be when caught up on a fall of about six or six and a half feet. The knot on Corbett's neck was brought in front of the ear, and that on Fleming's behind it. Corbett, it will be remembered, died much more easily than Fleming. The former hung 31½ minutes, and the latter 19½.

WINTER IN CALCUTTA.

ONE of the popular delusions which we steadily entertain in this country is that there is no cold weather in India. In the first place, it is absurd to sum up the whole country, which has several varieties of climate, in one sweeping assumption. But in every part there is cold weather, more or less, even though, as in Madras, there is very little of it at any particular season, and your relief from the prevailing heat is principally obtained in the sea-breeze which blows in the evenings throughout the year. But even the Madras Presidency has accessible hills, which are uninhabitable only when ice cold; while in the plains, in the north-west, and the Punjaub, there is winter to that extent—that, during four months or so in the year, you may make ice sufficient to last for domestic purposes during all the hot weather. In Calcutta there is nothing like this state of things; and, in the case for ice, the Presidency would be nowhere, but for the American ships, which bring over enough to keep the population in skating, if it could be adapted to that purpose. But, still, Calcutta has its winters, as cold as occasional mild winters in this country; when, though the days are usually bright, the nights are damp, and chilly, and misty, and sometimes foggy to a fault; when you are glad of a fire at home, and have to go abroad in your thickest coats; when you get coughs, and colds, and ailments that settle on the lungs; and, in fact, have most of the reasonable enjoyments of home, including storms, which come on with a suddenness and a violence unknown in these prosaic regions.

It is one of the latter that is depicted in the accompanying sketch. But do not suppose, for a moment, that the artist means to give us an illustration of the late cyclone, which is, happily, a visitation of a kind very seldom known. Any respectably severe storm, during either the rains or the cold weather, will produce the effects here portrayed. During the rains nothing is more common, after a deluge all day, than an accommodating state of the atmosphere towards evening—say at four or five o'clock—which tempts people abroad. Things, in fact, look quite charming; nobody has any fears either for their horses or themselves; carriages are ordered in a hundred houses, and crowds sally forth to enjoy a little of the beauty of nature before the inevitable advent of dinner and the surrender of their free will to the domestic four-walls until bedtime. For be it remembered Calcutta is not a place where people can always find places of amusement wherein to disport themselves after the meals of the day. Men can go in search of possible billiards, especially those who belong to a mess; but for ladies there is very little relaxation to be found out of doors, and the majority of families do not attempt to discover any beyond the limits of private parties. They are, therefore, doubly anxious to take the air during the afternoon, if the air will only allow them; and it continually happens that they are too confiding in appearances.

The storm always seems to wait until nearly everybody is out, and then it bursts forth with a vengeance. All is smiling and serene, when clouds are seen gathering ahead, and then great claps of thunder seem to split the sky, which is illumined from time to time by lightning, of which it would be difficult to form an idea from the feeble attempts at such demonstrations as are seen in this country. The rain, too, descends, not in lines, as we see it here, but in streams; the sky, instead of yielding it in regular order, pouring it down even in masses.

At the first intimation of the outbreak the horses' heads are all turned towards home; and as everybody lives in the same quarter, and everybody has driven out much in the same direction, the spectacle has all the animation of a contested race. Occasionally you hear of a carriage being completely overturned by a sudden squall; and facetious people declare that upon one occasion, when a lady was thrown out, she lay so long exposed to the drenching downfall, that her hair turned its color to that of a peagreen—a change which, however, we are not prepared to say is the usual effect of a copious immersion.

Being caught in a storm of the kind, too, is always the more annoying, owing to the fact that, no sooner have you got home and into dry clothes, than Nature begins to smile again—with something of a grin, surely, this time—and ten minutes afterwards there is a general "clear up," the sky looking so beautiful in reflecting the setting sun that the prospect of bad weather for any time to come seems utterly out of the question.

WINTER IN CALCUTTA.

FARTHER FROM THE GOLDEN SHORE.

BY J. W. WATSON.

They led me to my brother's side,
'Tis full a score of years ago,
I saw how much my mother cried,
The cause of grief I did not know;
They raised the white sheet from his face,
I marked its pallid, marble hue,
And, by my mother's close embrace,
The first sad tale of death I knew.

But still my mtanght, baby heart
Received the tax of death in vain;
Too well I knew we drift apart,
Yet still I thought he'd come again.
For days and weeks, with anxious eyes,
I asked my mother why he slept;
My words but brought the same replies—
She only hissed my lips, and wept.

One day there came a whispered word,
That he would come no more to me,
But that, like some imprisoned bird,
Myself would wander far and free;
That if a stainless past were mine,
Upon a bright, unfading shore,
Whenever I like rills recline,
Would meet to part for never more.

Content was I; with tender care
His little toys and pets I kept,
And took them to the churchyard, where
My darling brother soundly slept.
I sat and whispered to the grass
My little heart's most secret store,
And many a sigh I heaved, alas!
Because I had not loved him more.

His little garden, full with flowers,
I tended, with a love that seems
The poem of my childhood's hours—
I thought he'd know it in his dreams.
I sowed his name and mine in seed,
That sprang in beauty, twining high,
Forgetting, in my loving greed,
That even things of beauty die.

But sadly, as the years went round,
I gathered wisdom on my way,
And in my very loving found
That mourning farther day by day.
I found—ah, me!—that childhood's feet
Are ever wandering by that shore,
But that each coming year we meet
Is whispering never, never more.

Oh, for the days of baby love!
When, by his little grave, I lay
And looked towards that golden shore
That did seem so far away.
But now, with years and worldly care,
My heavenly sight has grown so dim,
That, though I see my brother there,
My hope is small of joining him.

A TERRIBLE VISITOR.

IT was in compliance with the mandate of my medical man that I found myself late one autumn, about a dozen years ago, at the little town of Quimper, in Brittany, surrounded by the establishments of a married man on his travels. Not, indeed, that I intended my journey to extend much further at that time, for I had taken a fancy to the quaint old-world Breton country, and so long as I escaped the keen easterly winds of our English winter, I had free choice left me to pitch my tent for the next few months at whatever spot I might think best; and it seemed, both to myself and to those who were with me, that we might go further and fare worse.

When it was understood throughout the little town—and news of any kind seems to spread fast among our vivacious neighbors than among our more phlegmatic selves—that the English family at the Lion d'Or were in search of quiet respectable entry lodgings, we were literally inundated with offers of the most diverse kinds, and all more or less ineligible; ranging from a couple of bare and unstable bed-rooms, the residence of a provincial magnate, more suited to the pocket of a millionaire than that of a poor painter; matters came to such a pass before that, that we could not venture so far as the market-place without being beset by two or three applicants, all eager to welcome us under their auspices, so that we were fain at last in time to meditate a secret flight, that we might save ourselves the last moment, and capitally suited into the bargain.

About eighteen miles from Quimper there stands, or stood at the time of which I speak, for of its utter fate I have no knowledge, an old-fashioned house of considerable size, with high-pitched roofs, twisted chimneys, and dormer windows, known, appropriately enough, as Richard the Gray enough it certainly was—a grim, melancholy house, with a sort of desolate pride about it, like that of a decayed gentleman who remembers what his better days; but wonderfully comfortable and home-like within doors. It stood fronting the south, surrounded by a piece of ground, half garden, half orchard, and more wilderness than either; before it the highroad, that swept round to the left, and then dipped into a little hollow, where a hamlet lay snugly hidden; behind it, a stretch of undulating meadow, that swept gently upward to where a fringe of poplars crowned the horizon; beyond which were more fields, sloping downward till you reached the ever-shifting sandunes and the green waters of the Channel.

Maison Gris was two hundred years old, and had never belonged to but one family. Of this family, which pertained to the class of what we in England should call gentlemen farmers, the last scion preferred the gay salons of Paris to the quiet home of his ancestors, and had long been desirous of finding a tenant for the old house, and increasing thereby his somewhat limited income. The rent demanded was moderate in amount, and as we could find no other place that promised to suit us equally well, a bargain was quickly struck; and three days later, ourselves and baggage were comfortably installed in our new home. The house, to be sure, was far too large for the requirements of our small family, which consisted only of myself and wife, and our little girl, Mimi, eight years old; my wife's sister, Miss Jane, and Breton lasses to wait upon us; but we put such of the rooms as we did not require under lock and key, and feminine fashion soon gave the place a comfortable homelike appearance.

Our life at Maison Gris was, of necessity, a very quiet one; many people just now have called it a dull life, but we did not find it so. Our mornings were variously occupied: my wife's in looking after the needful domestic arrangements; Miss Jane's in stilling into Mimi's mind some of those multifarious items of knowledge which go to form the sum of a modern young lady's education; and mine, while I worked on steadily at my great picture, growing more in love with it from day to day, as bit by bit, like a blind worker, I set to work and took shape and color under my brush. Our afternoons were spent mostly on the sands; and music, chess, and reading charmed away the evening hours. We had brought a tolerable box of books with us, and an intermittent shower of newspapers and periodicals kept us from stagnation, and told us how the busy world was wagging.

I had chosen one of the best apartments in the house for painting-room. It had been the old dining-saloon once in a time, and had a large mullioned window fronting the north, consisting of small diamond-shaped panes set in lead, with thin iron bars running across at intervals, and having the family lozenge let in, high up, in painted glass. After the fashion of the time, from which this window dated, a small casement opened out of its middle compartment; but the heap of this casement being defective, I had found out a ready way of opening it from the outside by means of a bit of crooked wire; and sometimes when I was hard at work, and tired out, the minx would cease from trundling her hoop in the garden, and wait with her nose pressed against the window for the expected opening of the bit of half smile; taking which as permission, she would manipulate for a few moments with her bit of crooked wire, when the casement was thrown wide ready for such emergencies, till the harp yielded, and the casement opened, then she would creep demurely through, and stand at my elbow for a time. Two doors opened into this room; one from a corridor which ran through the lower part of the house, the other from a portion of the veranda which led by a descent of two or three steps into the garden. Why I am thus particular in my description of this room will appear by and by.

My great picture, as I have called it, and which I had fully determined in my own mind should be an advance on all my previous efforts, and be ready for such emergencies, till the harp yielded, and the casement opened, then she would creep demurely through, and stand at my elbow for a time. Two doors opened into this room; one from a corridor which ran through the lower part of the house, the other from a portion of the veranda which led by a descent of two or three steps into the garden. Why I am thus particular in my description of this room will appear by and by.

My great picture, as I have called it, and which I had fully determined in my own mind should be an advance on all my previous efforts, and be ready for such exhibition as might be open to me, was "Lady of Shalott," where the boat, which the poor lady has found under the willows, is floated by the tide, with a silent burden, full of "many-colored" samlet, and "knight and burgher, lord and dame" crowd on to the wharfs, marveling who this may be. But besides this, I had another purpose in view in the choice of a picture for relief when the necessity for change came upon me.

The second picture was a commission of my friend Sir Richard Thornfield, at whose house in the Peak I had been staying a short time previously, and had listened to a strange family legend which had been current in his family for several centuries, for the Thornfields were quite sufficiently ancient to have a family legend of their own; and however lightly they might seem to regard it, you could not touch them on a more tender point than by attempting to make fun of the family ghost. As is usual in such cases, the apparition never appeared except as a presage of death to some member of the family; and Sir Richard, who was of this peculiarity about the Thornfield ghost, that it was never seen in proper person, but merely an indication of it by the sound of rustling silk, you were quietly shaving, or arranging your cravat before the glass, you would see the reflection of a ghastly woman's face and figure in the glass, which, as your own face in the glass, with such a stony, merciless glare in its unwinking eyes, as would be the moment from which your dreaded Horror-struck, you would turn round to see nothing; and when your eyes wandered instinctively back to the glass, the ghastly vision would be gone, not to re-appear, perhaps, for several years.

But it was one instance in particular of the appearance which my friend was desirous that I should illustrate with my brush. The incident in question happened under his own roof on the eve of the wedding-day of one of the daughters of the house. The baronet showed me her portrait in the gallery—a beautiful young creature of eighteen summers, still, after all these years, looking out at the world with tender, serious eyes, was no longer conscious of the near and awful presage of the sad fate in store for her. The morrow was to be her wedding-day, and late in the evening, she crept upstairs to her dressing-room to try on some of the pretty things in which she was to be separated the next morning.

The white gauzy robe had been tried on and spread out upon a chair, the set of wreath, a string of pearls into her hair, when, all at once, she saw the dreadful face, with its Medusa eyes, staring intently over her shoulder at her own face in the glass. The smile died on her lips, and the gladness out of her eyes, as she looked. She turned and fled to her mother's room, to lose sense and motion the moment she felt herself within the shelter of those protecting arms, and in less than a week she was dead.

Such was the episode which my friend was desirous that I should depict. I had brought with me a sketch of the young lady's face, being desirous that my picture should be as accurate as possible in every particular; although hers was a face that, once seen by an artist, would not readily be forgotten. As if it had been put there to suit the purpose I had in view, I found in the state-bedroom of Maison Gris an old-fashioned cheval glass, than which, with no fantastic framework of carved oak, nothing could have been more appropriate for the background of my picture. I at once caused it to be transplanted to my painting-room, and placed in the several requisite, especially with a sheet of green baize thrown over it to keep it from the dust.

Madame, the wife and company of her lodyship of Shalott, I turned to my "ghost-picture," as Mimi called it, by way of variety. Then was the glass transferred to my wife's sister, who would pose herself before it, as in the act of twining a string of pearls in her hair, while I transferred to my canvas the reflection of her figure, the face in her little head, the flowing masses of her chestnut hair, with the up-curved arms and the tapering fingers lifted above.

The two faces as seen reflected in the glass—that of the apparition peering blue-white over the bridal shoulder, and that of my own face—I left till the last, or, rather, was waiting till some moment of inspiration should lend my fingers the necessary power to produce exactly on canvas the two faces as I saw them in my own mind.

Among the minor virtues of civilisation, that of early rising cannot be said to be considered as one; and now that I was in villégiature, I fell back upon a primitive division of time such as may still be observed in the more remote places, but which it would be quite impossible to observe amid the countless employments and distractions of life in town. Thus, I was commonly happened to rise with the first streak of daylight, and taking a couple of biscuits in pocket, set out for a six miles' walk before breakfast, or a ride for one on horseback, after which I generally felt myself in tune for a good spell of hard work.

On the morning of the day up as I had often done before, just as the sky was beginning to purple with the coming day, and slipping quietly downstairs, I unbarred the front door, and paused a moment or two on the steps enjoying the delicious freshness of the morning. While standing thus, the idea entered into my head that it would be as well to take a peep into my painting-room, and see that everything was right there.

On leaving off work the previous evening, I had left open the door leading out into the veranda, in order that the room might be purified by morning from the smell of some turpentine which I had incautiously used. Now I had almost entirely forgotten to shut before going to bed, and the idea now struck me, that it would be as well to see that no stray cat or dog had made itself free to the trunks among my brushes and colors during the night.

The door leading from the verandah into the painting-room was at an opposite angle of the same from the window, and now standing, as I descended the steps leisurely, and walked across the grassplot towards it, noticing as I did so, what I had never noticed before, that the old house looked older and grayer, showed the scars and wrinkles of age more than ever in that cold half-light of early morning than when seen at any other hour, even under the bright rays of midday. As I stepped under the verandah, I saw with some surprise that the door in front of me was shut. It was a wringing door that could of its own accord unless fastened back, and on leaving it over night, I had propped it open with a chair which was now gone, and the door closed.

Inferring from this that some means this had come about, I passed open the door and went in. As I entered the room, I mechanically let go the door, which swung to after me in, and in the same instant I felt, rather by intuition than by the evidence of my senses, that there was a figure which stood up with something that had no business there—with something which I had but an instant or two before been unaware of, but which, the next instant to look round, the next, my wandering gaze fixed itself upon two great blazing eyes staring balefully at me from a dusky corner of the room; but in that one second of time my mind had told me that the figure in the cheval glass in the centre of the room, my easel in one corner, the form of Mimi on the floor, and the other familiar objects further away in the big room still showed indistinctly through the dim gray light, I received a blow with an iron bar across the old window; then the eyes took me, and as I first saw them, I saw them no more, but there shrilled me, I think that I could hardly have uttered my loudest cry, and then all was dark. I was glared at me unwinkingly from the semi-obscurity of the corner with a sort of concentrated ferocity that seemed to freeze up the very heart's blood.

To what strange monster crouching there, but half seen in the darkness, belonged those eyes I cannot tell. Not long was I left in doubt. With a snarl, low, fierce, continuous, with an upward and bristling of its immense back; with its mouth grinning murder; with one crouching step back-ward, as if to gain space for a terrific leap for a spring; and with one mighty rush, the tiger was upon me. I saw it all in the space of a single bolt, a blood-red light danced for an instant before my eyes, and then came a darkness as of death.

My senses came back but slowly. I awoke by degrees to a consciousness of life. but it was a life utterly disowned from that of my former self. I was no longer the master of Maison Gris; I was no longer a nineteenth century unit struggling for my daily bread, and enjoying in the best of all the Great Pyramid. I had been lying there as one dead for three thousand years, and now, by some strange process, I had come troublously into life, had been resuscitated, and it seemed only to fol-low in the natural course of things that I should awake and find myself the inmate of a gorgeous sarcophagus. I was not surprised. I gazed around me with interest, but without curiosity; I seemed to have been there before at some far distant date, and now I recalled already that from the moment when I first opened my eyes, and even before that, as it seemed to me, I had felt the oppression of something ponderous on my chest, of a weight that seemed to grow heavier and denser every minute. What could it be? I tried to move my limbs, to lift my body into an upright position; but the cere-cloths in which I was swathed from head to foot left me without the power to move even as much as a finger, and still that mysterious weight upon my chest was becoming more distressing and deadly every moment. For some reason unknown to me the lid had been lifted off my sarcophagus; a tender radiance shed by invisible lamps pervaded the vast apartment, and although I was unable to move my head and look round, I could gaze forward, and my eyes on their awakening circuit took in a considerable span of the flat roof overhead.

On this roof were painted in vivid colors constellations Egyptian symbols of gigantic size: the bull, the cat, the crocodile, the lion and the asp, were represented again and again, together with innumerable other symbols, all of which appeared strangely familiar to me. Suddenly, while I was gazing up the roof, I saw that the keystone was wanting, and that the whole immense fabric was slowly collapsing, gradually settling down, and soon before long must crush me, lay directly under the apex of the pyramid—yes, crush me under the weight of a hundred thousand tons. Already, here and there, great cracks were beginning to show themselves in the ceiling, too, no longer tinted so brightly; the roof seemed to be creeping down the walls, as though it were being let down by chains from above, every moment the air of the chamber was growing hotter and more stifling; every moment my deadly weight upon my chest was becoming more unbearable. Why had I been preserved for a fate so horrible, the last man left alive on the earth? How had I sinned so grievously, that such a sleep of three thousand years I should awake to the consciousness of a doom so dreadful? It was nearly upon me now, that terrible roof, with its gigantic figures, red, blue and blue, whose strange lifelike eyes stared so intently into mine. I could almost have touched it with my hand, had I been free.

Even now there was time to escape, if only there had been means and had happened to me? Ah, the tiger! I remembered everything now. He was dead, in reality, and as I was, though hardly as terrible as the doom which threatened me in my dream, if a dream it could be called. Then I felt a hand upon my cheek, which seemed to my half-conscious state had seemed ponderous enough to crush the brain that it sought to free. It was nothing more or less than the immense paw of the animal to be sure, but now was the slow shifting of it had broken my vision just at the point where endurance ends, and madness or death supervenes.

In that first moment of semi-consciousness, after opening my eyes, I groaned slightly, tried to turn over; but scarcely had I uttered a cry than I found that I was lying prostrate on the floor close to my shoulder, put forth his paw again, as though afraid I were going to escape him, and brought it down on the back of my head with an arm; at the same moment his claws shot from their sheaths like so many hidden poniards, and penetrated through the thick cloth of my shooting-coat to the flesh of my arm. But the very sharpness of which escaped my lips, to which the beast responded with a muffled roar; and then, for the second time, I fainted.

My poor, scattered wits, on dragging themselves together again, found after the interval of a second intuitively cognizant of the danger that beset me. I never dared to look at the tiger's face—to whisper "Beware!" I was conscious of the presence of the animal close beside me, before I opened my eyes; I felt that to move even an inch or a leg might be my death-warrant; I lay there like one dead, hardly daring to breathe, and awaited the ordeal still before me. At length I ventured to open my eyes a little way, and take a first silent observation of the enemy, and of my own position. The tiger was lying on his hidden paw, and lengthwise with a couple of feet of my right shoulder; one paw protruded a little further than the other, ready, therefore, for a spring on me again, in case of any movement on my part. He was a splendid brute, and I was able to admire him, and to admire him after the fashion of his family when they are not in the immediate neighborhood to be admired him hugely. Every quarter of a minute or so he gave his huge tail a slow, solemn whisk, bringing the tip down with a thump upon the wooden floor. It seemed to me, but perhaps I was too fanciful, that he was waiting for me to make some slight, or grim enjoyment about him, as he lay thus, gazing at me with concentrated fire in his eyes. Another ish green, that never wavered or turned away for a single instant. He seemed to feel himself so thoroughly master of the situation that he was in no hurry to proceed to extremities. Perhaps he was waiting for me to make some sign of the first hated race of men so completely in his power. Perhaps he was waiting to see if I would, to some extent, and yawned silently; and it makes me shudder even now when I remember the terrible cavity of teeth which it then disclosed. Time and again, he would give his lips an anticipatory lick with his red tongue, and then, as if he suddenly quivered like those of a cat that is watching a mouse.

It was broad daylight by this time, and such of the familiar features of the room as I could see without stirring my head were just as they had been left last night. The tiger, which I could now plainly see was young and in perfect health, doubtless come prowling about the house, entered the open door, closed the wringing door invitingly open, had walked in, overturning the chair in its passage, and had made for himself a safe lair on the other side of the door, in one corner, till roused by my entrance. But for my unfortunate habit of leaving the door of the painting-room, I should never have found myself in my present fix.

Instead of being close to the door by which I had entered, and which, as I supposed, was now found myself lying in a square of Persian carpet, and in close proximity to the second door, the one leading into the veranda. Immediately opposite to me, on the other side of the room, was a large old-fashioned cheval glass, of which I have already spoken, towards which the tiger's back was now turned, his head being between the tiger and the window, supported by two wooden uprights, and covered with green baize, behind which my easel, behind which my picture was partly hidden, one side only of it being visible from where I lay. All this time I had been gathering up my energies to meet the fate that loomed so imminently before me with whatever of courage and composure was possible to me. My chances of escape seemed very faint indeed, but none the less did I keep revolving one scheme after another in my brain—never throbbing with a fuller life than in that hour of my extremity—only to reject them one by one as impracticable. Alas! for me there seemed no help on earth.

A dull vague despair, in spite of my efforts to the contrary, was beginning to settle down over my soul, when, bringing my eyes to rest once more on the brute beside me, I saw, with a thrill of hope, that those unwavering eyes had closed at last. He was asleep, with one paw laid against my shoulder, ready to grasp me should I offer to stir. A small matter, truly, to cause me to thrill with hope, but I could not help accepting the fact, trifling as it was, as an augury of good promise. Lightly and delicately the tiger slept—as lightly as any maiden dreaming of her lover, and waiting for his coming. I ventured to open my eyes a little wider, and a moment afterwards a sight met my gaze which stirred my soul to its very depths, and would have drawn from me some cry or movement of surprise, had not the painful lesson of a few minutes before been still fresh in my memory. What I saw was the white agonised face of my wife peering in through that corner of the window not hidden by the cheval glass, and Laura's face, scarcely less anguish-stricken, gazing over her shoulder. They had discovered my dangerous position; would they be able to help me? My wife's eyes and mine met in a long, yearning, heartfelt gaze across the little space that kept us asunder. I had learned to read the language of those dear eyes years before, and their meaning was plain to me now. They told of love and pity, in a way that no mere words could have done, and yet breathed, withal, a spirit of hope and consolation almost divine, as though wishing me not to forget that both her and mine were in the hands of a merciful Power, without whose permission not even a sparrow can fall to the ground.

Suddenly, Laura whispered something in my wife's ear, and a flash passed over the faces of both. Then Laura held up her hands in a way that made me grasp her idea in an instant. She was going to communicate with me by means of the manual alphabet—called by some people "the deaf and dumb alphabet," with which we were both acquainted. One by one I spelled out the words as she formed them, letter by letter, with her fingers. Her first communication ran thus:

"Courage. We are praying for you with our hearts, and working for you with our heads. We are trying to devise some means of rescue, and do not despair of success."

Then they both kissed their hands to me, and went back out of sight. I knew that they would come again in a little while; that they had merely left me in order to talk over some scheme of escape. But what chance of escape was there indeed for me? None, none that I could discern.

Presently they returned, and Laura had Mim in her arms, whom she lifted up to look through the window at poor papa. The child was frightened when she saw the great brute beside me, and turning away, put her arms round her aunt's neck, and burst into sobs. A low growl from the tiger warned us all that the least disturbance might be fatal to me. Laura took the child away, but my wife remained by the window, her hands clasped one in the other, her head drooping against the stonework, gazing at me through the panes with tearless despairing eyes. In a little while Laura and Mim came back; and Mim, no longer terrified, now looked through the window at me, and smiled and kissed her hand. Then came another message, worked out by Laura's nimble fingers:

"We have thought of a plan, which, with Heaven's help, we hope will succeed. Lie perfectly still, and do not be surprised at anything you may see or hear. God bless you!"

A minute or two later, my ears, preternaturally alert during those terrible moments—indeed, all my senses at that time seemed to be preternaturally alive—detected a faint rasping sound, which I had heard many a time before, only this time it was fainter and more cautious than usual. It was the noise make by Mim when she opened the casement from the outside by means of her piece of crooked wire. Faint as the noise was, the tiger pricked up his ears, and gave utterance to another low, deep-throated warning. The noise ceased for a little while, to commence again about a minute later; and this time the beast did not deign to notice such a petty interruption of the prevailing quietude. In a little while the noise ceased, but whether the casement was now open or shut I had no means of judging, hidden from view as that part of the window was behind the cheval glass. But even if they had succeeded in opening the casement, in what way could that fact conduce to my deliverance? Had I even possessed the tiger's full permission to use such a mode of exit, the casement was far too small to admit of my passing through it.

Laura coming back to the window, telegraphed to me for the third time with her fingers:

"All is prepared. Wait and be silent. Our hearts are with you."

Dear ones! that their hearts were with me, I never for one moment doubted; nor that whatever womanly wit, sharpened by the most devoted love, could do for my deliverance, would be accomplished by those two!

My wife, Laura, and Mim were now all gone, and I was left alone with the sleeping tiger. A short space of the most intense silence followed, and then my ear, hungering anxiously for some sound, detected a faint rustling in the direction of the window, but so faint, so like a whisper of silence itself, that in any ordinary mood it would not have reached my senses at all. Although his eyes were still closed, and he was to all appearance asleep, I saw, by a slight pricking of the tiger's ears, that the noise had not been unnoticed by him. It was with a feeling of sickening anxiety, which I should vainly try to describe, that I awaited whatever might happen next.

Suddenly my heart gave a great bound, and I felt that there was some one in the room beside myself. There had been no noise, no movement, further than the one of which I have just spoken, and yet all at once I knew that I was not alone—knew it by some delicate, intuitive sense, by some subtle, spiritual affinity between myself and the intruder, which is as much a mystery to me now as it was then. The tiger, too, seemed to have had his suspicions aroused. First, his whiskers twitched nervously; then he half-opened his heavy lids, and glared at me with his yellow-green eyes, in which there was a smouldering ferocity that might leap into a blaze any moment; while his tail began to curve uneasily, and from his cavernous throat there issued a muffled growl of menace, long drawn out. Oh, the soul-wearing anxiety of those few moments! Even now I shudder when I recall them.

With half-shut eyes I watched and waited. The intense silence of the room was unbroken. At once, without any warning sound or intimation of what was coming, I saw a wee white hand and slender white arm protruded from behind the cheval glass. "Great heaven!" I cried to myself, "that is the hand and arm of my darling Mim!" and my eyes blurred over with tears, and all my heart went forth in a great silent cry to heaven to protect and save my child.

When I could bear to look again, the hand and arm were gone, but the object for which so much had been ventured was safely accomplished. Fastened to the curtain of green baize which covered the cheval glass were two brass rings, and to one of these rings Mim's little hand had now succeeded in hooking a thin cord; so much I at once discovered, although for what purpose the cord had been thus attached, I was utterly at a loss to conceive. I was, however, far too anxious just then regarding Mim's safety to give more than a passing thought to any other subject, however strange. But so cautious, as well as brave, was my little darling, that not the faintest sound betrayed her presence, till, as I was afterwards told, she had reached the casement, and was about to be drawn through it by her aunt, when her foot slipped, and her head coming in contact with the stonework of the window, she gave utterance to a low cry of pain. That cry thrilled through me; but no sooner did the tiger hear it than he started up with a roar that seemed to shake the room, and the same instant the claws of his right foot buried themselves in my shoulder, only to be withdrawn the next moment, so as to enable him to turn himself round, which he did with one sudden swing of his huge body, standing now with his face to the cheval glass and the window, from which point he evidently sniffed danger. Fortunately, he did not attempt to go near the window, otherwise poor Mim's fate must have been sealed before she could have escaped through the casement. As it was, the brute contented himself with standing directly over my body, and giving utterance to a series of terrific roars, such as might well have made the stoutest heart in my position quail with fear. Did some instinct dimly apprise him that he was in danger of losing his prey—that the dainty dinner of man-flesh which he had made his own so easily, and over which he had luxuriated for the last hour or two, dwelling in imagination on the delicious feast to come, was about to be spirited from him? Be that as it may, the tiger was quiescent no longer; the crisis of my fate, either for salvation or destruction, was evidently at hand.

Mim was safe by this time; I had a glimpse of her white face as the Breton nurse hurried with her past the window; and I could now afford to turn my mind to the consideration of my own danger; and truly my prospect of deliverance seemed at that moment a faint one indeed. The tiger's suspicions were thoroughly aroused. He had now taken to walking round and round me in an unending circle, sniffing at me from time to time, and growling to himself, while I lay with shut eyes simulating death as closely as possible. Suddenly he stopped in his walk, and fell back a pace or two from me; and at the same instant there burst from his throat a loud snarling yell, half of rage and half of fear. The cord hooked on to the ring by Mim had been pulled from outside the window; the sheet of green baize had fallen away from before the cheval glass, and the startled beast, turning at the sound, saw reflected therein another tiger and another man. With him to see and to act were one. His tail lashed his sides once or twice as he stood gazing for a moment at this intruder on his territory; then, still snarling viciously to himself, with contracted body, and all his huge muscles quivering with excitement, he worked his way backward almost to the door, so as to give himself more room for his spring; then all at once curving his body into an arch, and bringing his grinning muzzle nearly to the ground, he shot over me like a flash of yellow light, aiming straight at the reflection of himself in the glass. Carried by the impetus of his spring, he shot clean through the glass and woodwork behind it, coming out on the other side, bleeding, and partially stunned, and quite as much frightened, I suspect, as either. But at the first sound of shivered glass, and before the scared beast had time to recover his presence of mind, the door behind me was suddenly opened, and my two good angels rushing in, seized me as I lay, and with a strength which at any other time would have astonished themselves, they lifted me lightly up, and swung me out of the room. It was the work of a moment. Laura's bold device had succeeded, and I was saved.

The rage of the tiger was something fearful, when he found out how he had been tricked, and that his prey had really escaped him. Later on in the day came the caravan-people from whose custody he had escaped on the previous night shortly after feeding time, and in such a quiet cunning fashion, owing to one of the keepers having imperfectly fastened a small grating at the top of his den, that his departure was not discovered till daybreak. He had subsided into a fit of sulks by the time the keepers reached Maison Gris, and neither coaxing nor threats could stir him out of the corner in which he had taken up his quarters, and there was no keeper bold enough to venture into the room to him. Ultimately, he was captured by means of a tempting shin of beef fixed in an iron cage, which he was obliged to enter before he could get at it, and once inside the cage, his liberty was gone.

I was very ill for a long time, and nearly a year elapsed before my arms and shoulder were sufficiently recovered to enable me to use brush and pallet again. The scars I shall carry with me as long as I live.

THE SALE OF STOLEN PROPERTY AT POLICE HEADQUARTERS.

THERE are numberless sights in this metropolis that are reserved only for the few, and such is that we have illustrated.

It must be easily supposed that an immense city like New York, with its 2,000 policemen, would in some way capture a vast amount of stolen property. The large majority of these captured articles are, of course, identified and reclaimed by the owners, but still a considerable per centage left, and after being kept one year is sold. These sales are held once in two months at the Police Headquarters in Mulberry street, by the official termed the Property Clerk, and to these sales the public generally are invited, though perhaps only a few score of them attend.

The room in which they are held is divided off by a rail, and behind this rail the auctioneer takes his stand on a chair, attended by two colored gentlemen who do the rough work in the way of handling the goods to be sold, some of which are not very desirable handling.

The sale commences according to a printed catalogue, which scrip presents every style of personal property that can reach the imagination. It comprises, in this instance, 282 articles, commencing with a lot of pig iron, and ending off with one brown trunk.

All's fish that comes to the auctioneer's net, and consequently he goes on: "Now, then, gentlemen! what shall I have for this lot? Speak quick. What will you give me for this 'model of a sloop?'"

The model of a sloop finds a buyer at some price, and the next lot comes in turn. Let us give some kind of a summary of them—Lot of machinery; one hogshead and three barrels; three sailors' chests; 1,000 bags; box of herring; one fork; 24 small baskets; one guitar; two cans of fish; six bottles of wine; one jacket and pants; eight collars and five neckties; 15 soft hats; one box buttons; one lady's gold watch; three pairs spectacles; one revolver; 20 daguerreotype frames; seven door locks; three white spencers; two pairs India rubber shoes, etc., and so forth.

One after the other these articles of merchandise go up and are knocked down to the highest bidder, who grasps his property, pays his cash, and cares not a pin for the story attached to it, which, perhaps, is a chapter of the blackest crime, perhaps of the highest romance.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE WAR.

SINCE the closing of the rebellion we have heard so little of the Sanitary and Christian Commissions, that we can readily imagine their work finished. But this is not so. They are both still at work in spheres they yet find. One of these we give this week, in a representation of the Christian Commission distributing newspapers to Southern people. The sketch was taken at Savannah, but is applicable to many other localities. These newspapers are the contributions of our citizens and publishers, and though some of them may be a week or two behind time, they are all new to those who receive them, and are looked on by the recipients in strong admiration, generated by the fact that for some years their eyes have only been greeted by the six by nine wretched brown or yellow sheets in which rebeldom has been able to indulge.

Like the distributions of rations, the newspapers are all given out "under the flag," and any sympathizer has to kiss the rod to get the news.

THE FEARFUL ICE GORGE AT ST. LOUIS.

ST. LOUIS has been the scene of a fearful disaster. The ice above the city has suddenly broken loose and came down in such tremendous masses as to sweep all before it.

The scene of the disaster was a most exciting one. The levee was a perfect promenade of all kinds of people, gazing at and commenting upon the awful scene of smashed and sunken steamers which the moving ice gorge of Saturday evening had caught and crushed in its relentless grip. The river was frozen solid, and huge chunks of ice, five inches thick, were piled up in shapeless masses around the doomed steamers, flatboats, and broken wharves. A group of four boats, tightly jammed together, and so damaged, that it is not easy to distinguish one from another, lie in the stream on the verge of the channel. All the others are crushed against the bank—some broken fairly in the middle; others with their bows stove in, pilot-houses, upper-decks, and chimneys carried away.

The vessels injured, more or less, are as follows:

Name.	Value.	Name.	Value.
Admiral	$60,000	Bannock City	$1,000
Calypso	85,000	Amanda	1,000
Highlander (sunk)	30,000	Big Horn	500
Geneva	12,000	Merlana	500
Sioux City (sunk)	2,000	Argonaut	5,000
Omaha	5,000	Metropolitan	5,000
Belle of Memphis	1,000	Barges, flatboats, coal barges, &c	10,000
Cora	5,000	Freight in steamers and barges	20,000
Rosalia	5,000
Empire City (sunk)	12,000
Hattie May	3,000
Total			$213,000

The above are probably insured for $100,000.

The gunboats Eltah and Shiloh, lying at the foot of Plum street, are uninjured, their iron sides resisting the pressure of the ice.

Some accidents occurred in the scramble to get off the boats when the gorge above began to move, but no lives were lost.

The scene was picturesque as well as terrible. The sun shone brilliantly on the motley crowd of men and women in their Sunday costumes who bedecked the levee. Many went out to the wrecks, even ladies and children trying the dangerous experiment. The ice at Cora street was strong enough for quite a large number to cross to and fro.

The steamboat men were unprepared for this sudden moving of the ice, and the boats were therefore wholly unprotected. The disaster was almost instantaneous. Ropes and chain cables were snapped like twine, and the crushed and crumbling flotilla went a considerable distance down stream before its course could be arrested The heavier boats stove in the smaller ones lying between them, crushing some of them like nutshells and sinking their hulls to the bottom.

OPOSSUM HUNTING IN MARYLAND.

OUR illustration is almost classical, and hardly wants description. Its own story is written in every line of the pencil, and is suggestive of that good old melody of "Possum fat and hominy, and everyting dat's nice."

The opossum is a species of "varmint" that hardly comes within the line of our game laws, and by white men—especially those who have never eaten it—is looked on somewhat askance. But to the gentlemen of the colored persuasion he is what the woodcock is to us, the very acme of gastronomical beauty. They regard his capture as the millenium of hunting, and the seasonable condition when that said "possum fat" is in best order, as the alderman would regard the green lumps of turtle floating in his soup.

Opossum hunting with the negro is at all seasons, but that time when the frost sets in or snow is on the ground is the best. At such time the skill of the darkey huntsman, who can nose out an opossum at any reasonable distance, is only to be matched by that of the dogs who, in the same manner that our pointers, setters or retrievers are trained, can follow and bring down the coveted little animal under circumstances that plead for something almost akin to reason.

Though "possum hunting" is a black art, we confess a weakness for it.

SKATING.

WITHIN a few years this species of gymnastic exercise has become a leading fashion in this country, and the man who has not yet reached the mature age of a couple of score, who in his youth counted himself "some" on the ice, can now retire into the shade, before the wonderful gyrations of his children, even down into the fourth and fifth steps. In fact, the youngster of five is as well up in ice business in these days as our fathers or grandfathers were when full-grown men. Everybody skates, and it is about as much out of the way to confess that we do not skate, as it is to admit that we do not dance.

Just now the season is opening, and skaters are bringing forth last year's steel, and complacently fitting it to their feet. Gimlets are in request, and the thermometer and barometer are viewed with agitation. Poets are inspired with ice poems, and romances are weaving to be spun out upon the congealed lake. All the world, which means all the world that has legs and something in the skate way to attach to them, are interested. The papers chronicle the daily condition of Central Park pond, the 5th Avenue pond, and all the other ponds, with as much avidity as they once chronicled "the war."

This season, we predict, will be only one of an increase of the passion. Those now will skate who never did before; and those who always skated, now will skate the more. The amount of matrimony and flirtation that will grow this year upon the ice will require many statisticians to keep count of, and the amount of real fun outside of that can never be kept count of.

And so God bless the ice, and keep it firm and strong! Give us plenty of it, but let the weather be warm, and, if possible, the ice safe and perfectly skateable. Of course we know that cold weather, snow and ice are not compatible with poor men's comfort; but if we must have cold weather, we must, and so if we must, let us have good ice and plenty of skating.

RUINS OF OLD CHURCH AT JAMESTOWN.

MANY an interesting remembrance of the "auld lang syne" clusters around the subject of this sketch; visions of gay cavaliers with their rich plumes and trappings, of fair young damsels and haughty old warriors, with their ancient dames, arrayed in all the pomp of ruff and farthingale, that here attended mass and vespers, when all around was a vast wilderness filled with savages and wild beasts. Many a marriage ceremony and many a funeral service was solemnised within the walls of the old church, before Boston had become even a cow pasture. All this has long since passed away, and now a part of the belfry tower with a few piles of crumbling brick and the tall weeds waving in the wind alone mark the spot. The whole scene is one of decay and stagnation, so often to be met with in Virginia, despite its rich soil and vast mineral wealth. Near the church are the walls of a more modern dwelling-house, burned during the war, while on the other side is a small earthwork built by the rebels.

Before many years more have past the river which is slowly changing its bed will have washed away all that is now left of the church, and obliterate the last relic of the oldest city of America. Sic transit gloria mundi.

Let us hope, however, that this state of things has passed away with the "peculiar institution" that caused it. There is no reason why the Peninsula, so famous in our history, should not yet be as rich and prosperous as its fertile soil and fine rivers entitle it to become, and we do not hazard much in the assertion, that now the incubus is removed, and the country open to emigration, it will not be long before the Old Dominion will assume the position of importance for which nature designed her.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE HORSE.

Kloenne's Patent Hitching Bolts.

OUR engraving represents an invention, the usefulness of which cannot fail to be appreciated by all owners or keepers of horses. It is intended to supersede the inconvenient, inefficient, and, withal, expensive manner, now in general use, of hitching horses.

Every owner of horses is well aware that fastening the horses by simply tying their halter-string is inconvenient in many respects. The strings are soon worn out by friction, and an expense is incurred thereby which, in the long run, amounts to no inconsiderable sum. Furthermore, the horses, when they cast their forefeet over the string, cannot be unfastened without great difficulty which, in the case of spirited animals, may, not unfrequently, amount to positive danger. But the principal drawback of the prevailing mode of fastening horses lies in the impossibility of quickly untying the halter-strings in cases of fire or other danger. Hundreds of valuable animals have been lost in this way from no other cause than the difficulty of releasing them in time.

Kloenne's Patent Hitching Bolt is well calculated to obviate all these difficulties. As will be seen by the cut, it consists of a bolt which, when shut, is securely held in its place by a spiral spring working underneath the socket. The halter-string, ending in a dimple, is, by one simple movement, fastened in an instant, the bolt being pushed through the dimple. Or, a common rope-string may be used, by tying a knot at a convenient distance; the bolt, when shut, leaving just room enough between it and the screw-plate, to hold the rope, but not enough to pass the knot.

To unfasten the horse, no more than a simple pull or push at the knob of the bolt is required. To those who have to manage vicious horses, it is unnecessary to prove the advantage of this contrivance. When the horse, having cast his feet over the string, has become unmanageable, rendering any near approach to him dangerous to life and limb, a single pull with a long hook, or a push with a rod, will enable the keeper, from any safe position, to unfasten the horse, and thus to remove the cause of his viciousness.

Still more patent is the advantage of the hitching bolt in all such cases where, on a sudden emergency, it is desirable to unfasten a number of horses simultaneously.

The inventor has contrived an apparatus, as simple as it is ingenious, by which any given number of bolts in the same stable-row are connected through a strong wire. This wire is made to end in a handle (as seen in the figure III), which may be placed in such a position as to be easily accessible in cases of danger. A single jerk at this handle will then withdraw all the bolts and release all the horses in an instant. On the other hand, the wire does not interfere with the working of any bolt singly.

So obvious are the advantages of the hitching bolt, that several of the largest companies in the city of New York, using hundreds of horses, have introduced it in their stables as soon as the invention had been brought to their notice. Any one may see the practical usefulness and efficiency of this invention by paying a visit to the stables of Adams Express Co., 59 Broadway, or the Sixth Avenue R. R. Co.

John Hoey gives this certificate as to its merits:

New York, Oct. 31st, 1865.

MR. W. KLOENNE, 234 William Street:

Dear Sir—We have now in our use your Patent Hitching Bolts at our stables; we find them very useful, convenient, and satisfactory, and cheerfully recommend them.

JOHN HOEY, Supt.

For the benefit of the horse, that standard friend of mankind, the invention should be examined by every horse owner and lover of horses.

OUR NATIONAL WINTER EXERCISE—SKATING.

ER EXERCISE—SKATING.

MEMOIRE NE CHANCE.

BY M. ELIZABETH PERRY.

I laid my head on cushions at her feet,
And watched her fingers twist,
Within and out the mist,
Which she had woven in a mesh complete.

Her eyes, like beryls, looked down into mine,
So steadfast and so true:
I caught their calmness, too,
And simply said, "My darling, I am thine!"

She looked across salt meadows, to the sea,
Whose ripples lapped the shore,
Then turned to me once more
And said, "Oh, no, my friend, that cannot be!"

I tried to plead, she only shook her head,
And, pointing to the waves,
Said, "There are many graves;
In one of them my love is lying dead."

Into her eyes there came no look of pain,
Nor sign of unshed tears;
And yet I knew the years
Could never bring her love to life again.

Since then long years have died in summer flame,
Each one has had its charm;
And now upon my arm
A blue-eyed woman sleeps and bears my name.

And ever more to me her face is turned,
As though I were her sun,
And she the only one
On whom its ray had every fall'n or burned.

I love her, with a love that cannot cease;
And, toying with her hair,
I lose the thought of care,
And in my heart fold close the dove of peace.

But when the wind blows salt from off the sea,
The beryl eyes once more
Look on me, as of yore,
And then I sigh that they were not for me.

WHO SHALL JUDGE?

BY M. ELIZABETH PERRY.

Mrs. Rothe was a frail little woman, full of quaint conceits—her child's name, Veronica, was one of them.

They were all strange people, those Rothes; "a queer set," their neighbors called them—proud, selfish, vindictive. Fathers disowned their sons, mothers and daughters would meet like strangers; all of them—brothers, sisters and cousins—hated each other mortally, but were very clannish, withal; if some fair-faced girl among them was to be disposed of, none were found worthy of her beauty, and what they thought more of, her dower, save some black-browed cousin of the third or fourth degree. And so they intermarried until their blood grew thick, the family traits were heightened to idiosyncracies, every feeling became a passion, every thought a prejudice.

The old stock had been hardy and numerous—they were thinning and dying out, now; only one branch was left bearing the family name; when John Rothe died that would be blotted out; he had no son—only two daughters—Salama and Veronica.

John Rothe's father had been terribly angry when his son sold half the farm, reserving only the land along a wild, deep gorge through which the waters whirled in a rush of headlong fury; and when he had built his mills, and the old man first heard the roar and clang of the ponderous machinery, he would wink and nod, and shake his staff at them, sending his withered old face into such wrinkles of malicious prophesying as must have rejoiced his fatherly heart.

Eight years before, when John had gone to the seaport town and brought that pale, frightened-looking girl home as his wife, the old man had vented his spite in wicked sneers, and his son never forgave it, for unlike the Rothes in general, he loved his wife. Except those two things, his love and enterprise, he was no whit better than or different from the others.

His wife's family was as old, as narrow, and unwholesome as his own, only their characteristics were grown weaker with age, and when he carried Emily out of it the old household lost nearly all it possessed of either goodness or beauty, and she parcelled out both attributes to her daughters.

Salama was tall, slender, with graceful wavy motions, a face without color, not pale, but with a glow diffused over it like fire shining through faint amber; this fire culminated in her eyes, smouldering, too, but the flame leapt up in a continual blazing and darkling, that ebbed and flowed like a pulse beat in their gray depths; wonderful eyes they were—long, and heavily lashed; save her hair—which was a dense bronze, never changing its color in sun or shade—she had no other beauty.

Her mouth was nervous and uneasy, her lips for ever opening and shutting like those of a starved animal.

All this is what she was when grown; as a child, people did not like or notice her much—none, except her grandfather; in his crafty, disagreeable way, he flattered her and prompted whatever was evil, if evil there could be in an eight years old child.

Veronica was different—fair, sweet and loving; hearts went out to her instinctively. She had her mother's golden hair and clear wide eyes, purple as pansies, with hints of blue forget-me-nots lying cool in their darkness.

A laugh was always dimpling her round cheeks, and the shining head went dipping here, there, everywhere—a healthy little thing she was, swift of motion as a lapwing. There were two who did not love Veronica—Salama and her grandfather.

One knew just where to find Mrs. Rothe; coiled among the lounge cushions, her face towards the window, which held a living picture of tree and shrub, and through their green flutter the flash of falling water; her hands for ever wrought some dainty thing, laying the flowers on thick velvet beds, or else a mesh of lace whose spray clung to her fingers like frostwork over ivory.

One of her children was with her every moment. She played childlike with Veronica, and told Salama legends of knights and elves, goblins and ladies fair, and all the quaint imaginings into which was wrought the poetry of six hundred years ago.

Which child she loved best she could never tell. What mother can?

When her husband came to her side, then you knew where her offerings were laid. I have said John Rothe loved his wife; so he did, but it was not always apparent, and when he left her without a caress or some sign of love's freemasonry, you knew when Salama's mouth got that hungry look.

It was not that she thought he looked on any face and deemed it more fair than hers, or sought in other eyes for answering tenderness, but something else, a sense of loss and wrong. You, wives, know what it is; it has tightened your hearts and sent the smile in your eyes to a tear-drowned death many a time, and will do many more, while women are fond and men are careless.

Guy Somers came to see them with his newly married wife, doubtless a very happy couple, at least a very handsome one. Veronica smoothed the lady's pale hair, and touched the white velvety hands with a childish rapture. Children do feel such things. I remember, when a child, seeing one of my sister's friends standing in the lamp-light, her arms bare to the shoulder; they fascinated me; almost unconsciously I stole to her side and passed my hand up and down the cool snowy surface; the touch thrilled me, electrified me through and through.

Mrs. Somers affected Veronica thus:

"Oh, Salama!" she cried, "is she not a sweet, pretty lady?"

"I don't think so; her face looks just like a white cat's."

Guy Somers heard her.

"Come here, little one, and tell me what I look like," he said, holding out a hand slender as a girl's, and as fair.

She took in the picture greedily. Soft, light hair, which the wind lifted in plumes like floss-silk. Eyes such as Greuze gave his German women; a mouth vacillating, you would say, but when it settled into stillness the hard lines came out plainly enough. Then you would call it rapacious. Salama took it all in, and slipping her hand in his, said softly:

"You are like Sir Launcelot," she laughed.

"What do you know of him, child?"

"Oh! he was beautiful and wicked, and a maiden loved him well." She did not know it, but her voice fell into rhythm. "I loved him more than all the rest of mother's knights," she added.

"But how can you? You say he was wicked."

"I like wicked people."

The amused look in Somer's face broke into a laugh, as he said:

"Faith! little sinner, so I believe we all do, only few of us dare to confess it. But what do you think of Veronica; she's pretty, isn't she?"

"Do you love her, too?"

She cast his hand from her instantly.

"Why, you midge! is it possible you know how it feels to be jealous?"

But she went away clasping and unclasping her fingers in an angry, restless manner. Guy Somers looked after her, muttering:

"In a few years there will be enough in her to make a man."

The words were broken off by a voice, even, cool, as though its breath passed over ice.

"Come, Guy."

"If she had said "I love you," or called some tender name, it would have been in just that same cool, even tone; she could not have changed it, any more than she could touch her pale hair with warmer tinges, or make her blood go up, beat after beat, as many women's will when they hear a voice dear to them.

All that summer visit Guy talked with little Salama, repeating to her poems that made the light come throbbing to her eyes, and for a moment put the mouth to rest. He studied her just as he would another poem, quaintly written.

The season passed and more along with it until eight years had gone.

Salama had grown to be what I have told you; Veronica was the same child, only with added sweetness, and fairness, and youth's lightsome graces, playing about her bright, young head. She was ever beside her mother, who was growing etherealised, vanishing out the world. I do not know what made that great pain come into Mrs. Rothe's face, when she looked at Salama, or her voice fall into a sad quaver when she talked of, or to her, but so it was.

When Guy Somers came to take her to his home in the seaport town, this mother gazed long into her daughter's eyes, put her hands on her hair, where they lay like flecks of foam on its bronze; let fall great plashing, glittering tears, and covered the lips with kisses a thousand deep.

Pray God, they be pure lips always which take a mother's kisses off!

Salama went, and sitting opposite the fair, cold face of Mrs. Somers, I think she forgot her old opinion, and deemed it a fit accompaniment to the room beyond—the shining walls whose whiteness was just flecked with gold, a tiny vine of which carried its delicate tracery to the cornices, where it dropped in clusters of leaf and flower; lace curtains, thin as cobweb, wafted in and out the windows open to the floor, and caught in their meshes green and opal glows from the blooming plants beside them.

Looking from those windows one saw a stretch of sand and shell, and then a waste of undulating waves which broke their hearts upon the stubborn beach, and moaning at their hurt came ever back again, as though it might save them from the great steam monsters who ploughed them up, and despite their seething hate, dashed them this way and that at will.

Alas, for thy white sails, oh sea! How hath steam spoiled their old romance! But do you not pay the score? When the fire-demons burst their hearts, do you not leap and dance in the lurid glow, and toss the wretches cast on your bosom, and quash them and swallow them into your foaming jaws?

Salama thought something like this, and would have spoken it, but Mrs. Somers said:

"You are enthusiastic," and Salama, flashing a scornful flame at her, went on with her thoughts—wild ones they were—she had never seen the sea before.

Guy Somers came in and went straight to the flowers; bending over each one he drank their odorous breath.

Salama joined him.

"See," she said, pointing to a splendid white fuschia, "I found it faint and pale, but I made it drunk with air and sunshine, and see how royally it queens it now."

"Take it for treasure trove."

He broke the stem, and in a moment the rich, thick petals kissed her hair.

"I do not care for such things," Mrs. Somers said. "The plants are Guy's fancy; he raves about the ocean, too; you and he can sympathize, Salama."

So they could.

If not for those, what did Annie Somers care for? Why for piles of linen, white as snowdrifts, for clean sweet rooms, for unclouded glass, and speckless china; her poetry took substance in cakes, whose flaky sweetness melted on the tongue; in jellies transparent as prisoned sunshine; in luscious fruit, and frothing creams; and rare good poetry it was, as those who "raved" of sea and flowers acknowledged; a well-appointed house, and dainty faultless table answered her craving for the beautiful, and were they not the best of things? I am glad she had no children, though, such women were not meant for mothers.

Guy's brother came a few weeks after Salama. He was not handsome like Guy, but very grave and noble-looking, with a deep, calm voice, having in it courage for the living, comfort for the dying; Stephen Somers was a clean-souled, honest gentleman.

The four of them were walking on the sands one August night, looking at "The watchlights glimmer on the shore,

The shiplights on the sea."

The salt breezes swept in to embrace the waiting land odors, and the moon gazed at her face in the ocean in a tender, pitiful way, as though half of herself had fallen down there, and she longed to follow or woo it back.

Salama and Guy were together.

"Do you like wicked people yet?" he asked, suddenly.

"Better still, I think."

Why did he go on questioning her?

"And what of beautiful, bad Sir Launcelot?"

"He is the same knight now."

"And do you love him better than all, Salama? Tell me that."

The question was hot and eager, but there was no time for answer. Stephen and Mrs. Somers came up, and they went to the house together.

Kneeling at her window that August night, looking towards the sea, the smouldering fire of Salama's eyes drank up the tears, the hungry, gasping lips grew white.

"Better than all! Better than all!" she moaned. "God help me!"

And so say I, Salama Rothe, and "God help" all women whose souls must drink the poison fountain of iniquity, or go thirsty for ever. Why will not the waters of Abana and of Pharpar make us clean?

Was Guy Somers weak or wicked? These lines about his mouth did not look like weakness, if it was wickedness. He who created Adam and then cursed him knows; I only know that he adored beauty, that all things rare and glorious had for him a passionate language, and when it spoke in this girl's luminous face, when those wondrous eyes flashed the gleam of their torrid depths into his, "deep answered unto deep," and his heart famished with the hunger and thirst of hers.

There was wrong somewhere, but whose was it? His feelings and appetites were not of his creating—they came with birth and their impulses—had been lawful and pure until now. What was it that turned them into sins and plague spots? But he had a wife, you say. True; and when he told the man at the altar that he loved her, he thought he told the truth. It was the truth then. How could he know that God or Satan—which is it that works the evil?—would spread this net of fascination in his path, a snare for his soul? "He should have put it far away from him, and refused to drink of waters bitter at the fountain head." Ah, my saint, which one among us ever tasted the sweet cup of sin and ceased lipping it until we found lees at the bottom?

And she. Was she base and vile because all the woman in her was awake? Did she go into bondage willingly? No, no! Witness her struggles and writhings, her despairing cry for help. Oh, woman! beloved of God in the city of David, who shall write your story—who shall dare witness against you?

Yes, there was a terrible wrong. Where it was or whose the fault I cannot tell; I only know such and worse wrongs are thick over the world, and every day work out their dire results. They say a loving Father guides and rules it all, and His "tender mercy endureth for ever."

The days went on. If Annie Somers guessed the story they were telling, she made no sign.

September wrapped her gold and crimson robe over her bosom, and laid herself to sleep under the dun garb of October, the month when the wine press is trodden, when the countries of vineland drip with the blood of grapes, a fitful, hysterical month, one day pale and weeping, the next wild with delirious joy.

They had gone over every amusement again and again.

"We must make much of these bright days; they are the last and fairest of all," Stephen said, one morning at the table.

"Let's have a fishing bout by moonlight! What say you?"

"The very thing, Guy," said Mrs. Somers. "We'll land at Ellis Point, and have a chowder on the shore."

"Shall you like to go, Salama?" Stephen asked.

"Like it! Yes; anything to kill the laggard days."

What made them laggard, Salama Rothe? Why did the pulsing light in your gray eyes beat so fast? Was it because you caught a glance which it was sin to see? If so, look not again, for that way danger lies and guilty pangs.

The little craft scarce made a ripple as it skimmed up to the Point. Once on shore, Mrs. Somers' skill developed a dozen other delicious dainties beside the promised chowder.

Salama went off alone, and finding a rock, far out, amid the white surf, climbed upon it.

Guy stood a long time, and looked at the slender figure outlined against the sunset sky, and then went quickly up the beach and talked for near an hour with the men belonging to a sloop's boat lying there. When he came away, they had each something with which to drink his health, and buy such toys as sailors' sweethearts like.

Far out on the silvery track made by the midnight moon, the little boat lay still and lifeless, bearing its burden of four throbbing hearts. Other boats were out, too; from one of them, as it passed, a voice, sweet as a convent bell, swept over the waters, singing:

"Ave! Sanctissima!
'Tis nightfall on the sea.
Ora pro nobis!
We raise our thoughts to Thee!"

It might have been the Dove of Peace, folding her white wings, and lulling to rest the passionate night, so clear it was and calm.

Mrs. Somers slept, half buried in shawls and boat cloak, and a hush was over the rest. Away, seaward, the faint lines of the sloop were pencilled against the sky, where golden lances were lifting the golden mists, and painting them pink and amethyst; nearer, something dark rose and fell with the waves, bearing towards them.

Stephen was holding the tiller and did not see it; Guy did, and turned to the figure beside him, a wan, limp thing it was, damp and chill.

He touched the cold, listless hand and pointed, whispering softly, to the blot on the waves, shaped into a boat's prow now. She sprang upward. The struggle was over.

Stephen Somers, were you blind that you did not see? or, seeing, did not feel what was coming? They stood a moment—

One foot pressed on the gunwale, a hand on Guy's shoulder, the other stretching outward, her face toward the morning, the light shining through and over it, and quick in the palpitating eyes, he clasping her waist, and couching for the spring. The boat came silently alongside. Swift as thought he made the leap, hurling the little vessel backward, and swinging Salama safely over the side. The boats parted, there was a plash in the water between them. Rebounding, they ground together. When they parted again, the waves laughed in their faces, and not a ripple told where Guy Somers went downward to death. But Salama, they saved her.

Salama Rothe rolled rapidly homeward, and lying, with closed lids, thought how her mother's kisses would soon fall on her lips like melting pearls. Outside, the November day was gray and sombre, thick with mist and rain.

Shivering and shrinking in the chill air, under the dank, dripping trees, she opened the door from which, five months before, she had gone forth, one of Nature's pure-hearted darlings, to come back, shrouded in noxious vapors, the steams of the world's sin and sorrow heavy and hot about her, needing God's tender pity, crying out for it. Will the answer come in wrath? Aye. "The wages of sin is death," you know.

Pity her! Yes, an an all-pure Father may do that; pity but punish, for "whom He loveth He chasteneth." Angels may look with sad eyes on this sinner, but you will not, my saint, nor you, sweet vestal. Nay, turn your holy looks away, and lift your clean white garments, let them not be dabbled with her earthly stains. Shall you, because she weeps, wipe off her tears, and so contract her leprosy? Why, no. Let her weep if she can; if not, the fire in her heart will the sooner eat up its corruption. Poor saints! How the breath of this iniquity doth mingle with your up-going incense!

There was stillness in the house, if not peace. A thin, dark face, new to Salama, met her in the hall.

"Where is Veronica, my sister?" she asked, impatiently.

Could that be her, with yellow hair uncurled, and purple eyes grown dim with mourning? Yes, it was. She put her quivering mouth to Salama's cheek, and, without a word, led her to the room they had shared from childhood. A hard look settled over Salama's face.

"What is it, Veronica?" she asked, in a cold, dull way, listlessly laying aside her wrappings.

Her sister only said:

"Come with me."

And, clasping Salama's passive hand, they went dow the stairs, to the room whose window held the picture of tree and shrub and falling water, their mother's room; and she was in it, too, not on the lounge, but lying, full length, still and white, with stark hands folded on her breast, and stark limbs draped with flowing sheets—dead and cold, frozen into the nothingness of mortality.

Oh, yes; God pitied the sinner, and loved her well: witness for it the chastening He gave. What if to you or me it may seem like breaking a bruised reed? It is only broken that He may bind it up again. How blind we are not to see the tender mercy of His judgments!

Salama stayed in her room the next day, and heard the tramp of the pall-bearers, the thud of closing doors, and then came silence. She had not shed a tear, nor could she now; but she could think, and try to make her numb heart understand its loss. Wretched girl, had you thought a mother's kiss would take the poison from your lips and make them pure again? Did you hope that, when you should dream of thridding your fingers through light, plumy hair, of laying your head to rest on a throbbing heart, and waking, should know that the hair was matted and tangled with seaweed—that the heart was still for ever, with the wild waves beating above it? Did you hope that her arms would enfold you, her bosom bear you, and her cool hands on your forehead bring with them a benediction of peace?

No, no! You called for God's help once, do it again and again; and if it come not, why the calling may win you to heaven at last.

Veronica and she sat a long time talking of their mother, of what she had said and done those last days. Her death was the work of a minute. Of that other past Veronica knew nothing, nor ever would. She seemed to have grown old suddenly. The laughing, careless girl was changed to a thoughtful, low-voiced woman. How well it sat upon her! Beautiful as they were, her flowing curls had never decked her brow with half the grace of that soft-banded hair. The patient sweetness of her mouth was worth a thousand dimpling smiles, and those wide, pansy eyes looked on the world with such a loving trust as innocence can feel, and that alone.

Salama saw and felt it, for the first time in their lives. She put her arms around Veronica, and held her close.

"Oh, Salama, will you love me now? I never knew before how sweet it was to have a sister. We ought to love each other well, for mother was so dear to both."

Salama's hand was on the upturned mouth.

"No, child, you must not kiss me," she said.

Her voice had lost something out of it, its life was gone, just as the light had faded from her face, leaving it a dead calm, for ever.

A thin, dark face, the one Salama met, looked in a moment, and went again without speaking.

"Who is she, Veronica?"

Achsah, mother's maid; she came after you went away. A strange girl she is, but mother liked her deft, quiet ways, and father, too, would miss her. Poor father! Let's go to him."

They found him in the sitting-room, sad enough, but all his comforts cared for. That was Achsah's work. She was in the kitchen now.

"Why do you make the tea?" asked Salama, going to her.

"He likes to have me do it."

It was a quick, strident voice, not very pleasant.

"He! Whom do you mean?"

"Mr. Rothe."

"Veronica can do it just as well. I don't suppose he cares."

"Ask him," she answered, shortly.

"Achsah always makes the tea," said Veronica, coming in. "Father chooses to have it so."

After she went out, Achsah laid her hand on Salama's arm.

"I like you," she said, "and will do my best to please you, if only you will let me do for him the things she learned me how."

"Do what you will, I care not," Salama answered, shaking her off.

The year dispensed her months until the half were gone, and all that time the life in John Rothe's house was stagnant, each day was a mirror wherein the next one looked.

Veronica went quietly about her cares, Salama never interfering or doing anything, indeed, but lying in her mother's place; there was no outlook in her eyes—they were turned to the past—the dead past, and she had no future.

Rothe loved and was proud of his daughters, but he called for no service at their hands, and Achsah's busy fingers left little they could offer.

After that six months Stephen Somers came to oversee the mills and live with them, and it was beautiful to see the growing love between Veronica and him—she so sweetly fair and he so true and good.

He and Salama talked of many things, but never a word of Guy; they had buried him in their hearts and sealed the stone of the sepulchre.

The summer died, and winter covered her with snow.

Latterly Mr. Rothe was much from home; one soft April evening Salama saw him spring from his horse, and give his whip and gloves to Achsah, who was waiting to receive them. She flashed into the house and out again, and they stood parleying for a moment, then with a laugh he gave the bridle to her, and, Achsah, making herself his groom, led the horse away. Then Veronica went out to him, and folding her little hands over his arms, while he smoothed her bright hair, they talked a long time earnestly. Salama looked at them and thought what a handsome man her father was, despite his more than forty years.

Just as the night fell Veronica came in, and laying her troubled face down in her sister's lap, told Salama what her father had been telling her. He was going to bring a new wife home.

"Who is it?" she asked, after a long silence.

Veronica gazed in wonder at the ghastly face above her as she answered:

"Annie Somers."

Without a word Salama rose, and putting her away, went out; some one was crouching near the door; Salama caught her arm.

"Achsah! what are you doing here? listening?"

"Oh! don't—don't—I could not help it—my God! It will kill me! How can he do it—what shall I do?" writhing and moaning, she struggled away from Salama's hold, and fled past her down the stairs.

Salama went on, too, straight to her father. She dared to tell him every thing now, and she did, the whole, wicked, shameful story.

He raved like a madman, prowling up and down the room, he shook with impotent fury. The dead calm of Salama's face was unbroken; her voice did not lose its dull steadiness, until he stopped before her, and raising his arm, said hoarsely:

"You brazen thing! How dare you tell me this? You a Rothe—my daughter! No, by heaven, I cast you off—I loathe you—your very breath is pollution—and Guy Somers, the scoundrel! May Almighty God——"

"Stop!" she cried, clutching the upraised arm, "come with me, and then curse if you will!"

By main strength she drew him to the door and flung it open, pointing to the grovelling heap before the hearth, from which dry sobs were breaking.

"That is your work!" she hissed, "now curse Guy Somers if you dare!"

She told the truth, it was his work—but, done unwittingly—as his bewildered look gave testimony.

"What do you mean?" he asked, "what ails the girl?"

"What ails her? She is only sobbing her heart out for love of you."

"You are a fool, or worse? What should she love me for? I never gave her cause."

Two accusers! Achsah was on her feet now.

"You never gave me cause? Oh! you did—you did."

Salama was cool again.

"Hush! Achsah," she said. "Yes, father, you have done this wrong; I know how innocently, now, and God forgive me, for accusing you; but you have chosen her to wait on you at all times, giving to her the offices which should have been Veronica's and mine; only to-night, you made a groom of her, and what, think you, save love, could make her stoop so low?"

"I never dreamed of such a thing! She served me quietly and well, and that was all I thought about, or cared."

"Did that make her grief less, or real bitter, John Rothe?"

Achsah's face went down on her knees again.

"Come away, father," Salama said, leading into the room again.

She did not ask him to forgive her or take back his renunciation; but he took her into his arms, and laying her head on his breast, kissed her tenderly as her mother had done that day of parting.

When Annie came, she met Salama's greeting with just as smooth a brow and smiling lip as she vouchsafed to any, and never by word of hers did she call up the sleeping past.

And was she so angelic, then, that she forgave such wrong as this young girl had put upon her? Did she not rather meditate a sweet revenge? Would not her very presence be gall and wormwood to that sore heart, a continual reminder of another face, and the shame it brought her? Was not this her thought?

I think it was; but when she saw the proud young beauty blasted, the long, gray eyes, pulsing with light no more, but dulled and heavy with unshed tears, then, I believe that she, being neither saint nor devil, did forgive her, and came in time to trust, and like her, passing well.

Veronica! Veronica! Wherever I write the word a breath of purity hovers, and I see a fair, sweet face, with clear wide eyes and bands of shining hair, a patient mouth, whose tones for ever told of faith and hope, and trusting love; how many ears they soothed, how many hearts made glad, God and his angels know. If ever peace and holy truth take to themselves another name, I think it will be Veronica.

AN ITEM FROM THE INQUISITION.

FROM a little old smoke-dried copy of a book printed in Spanish at Amsterdam in 1680, and entitled "Narratives of the Inquisition Imprisonments in this very City of Cadiz, Spain, by Serafin de Carcel, who escaped to Holland after having been condemned to be burnt for Heresy," we take these facts. The story is too naturally told to need embellishment or endorsement.

Carcel was a goldsmith in the Serf's street, Seville, and was arrested on the 2d of April, 1680, at 10 o'clock in the evening, as he was finishing a gold necklace for one of the maids of honor. A week after his first arrest Carcel was examined. In an ante-room, says he (I give it, as far as I can remember, in his own plain touching way), a smith frees me of my irons, and I pass from the ante-chamber to the Inquisitor's table, as the small inner room is called. It is hung with blue and citron-colored taffety. At the end, between the two grated windows, is a gigantic crucifix, and, on the central estrade (a table of 15 feet long surrounded by armchairs), with his back to the crucifix, sits the secretary, on my right Francis Delgado Genados, the Grand Inquisitor, who is a secular priest. The other Inquisitors had just left; but the ink was still wet in their quills, and I saw, on papers before their chairs, some names marked with red ink.

I am seated on a low stool opposite the secretary. The Inquisitor asks my name and profession, and why I come there, exhorting me to confess as the only means of quickly regaining my liberty. He hears me; but, when I fling myself weeping at his knees, he says coolly there is no hurry about my case; that he has more pressing business than mine waiting (the secretary smiles), and rings a little silver bell which stands beside him on the black cloth, for the alcaid; who leads me off down a long gallery where my chest is brought in, and an inventory taken by the secretary. They cut my hair off and strip me of everything, even to my ring and gold buttons; but they leave me my beads, my handkerchief, and some money I had fortunately sewn my garters. I am then led bare-headed into a cell, and left to think and despair till evening, when they bring me supper.

The prisoners are seldom put together. Silence perpetual and strict is maintained in all the cells. If any prisoner moans, complains, or even prays too loud, the jailors who watch the corridors night and day warn him through the grating. If the offence is repeated, they storm in and load him with blows to intimidate the other prisoners, who, in the deep gravelike silence, hear your every cry and every blow.

Once every two months the Inquisitor, accompanied by his secretary and interpreter, visits the prisoners, and asks them if their food is brought them at regular hours, or if they have any complaint to make against the jailors. But this is only a parade of justice; for, if a prisoner makes complaints, these are treated as mere ravings and fancies, and never attended to.

But these severities are trifles in comparison to the tortures some of my fellow-sufferers were put to, because their crime of heresy could not be proved without their own confession.

The water torture consisted in passing water down the wretch's throat till he almost burst, and fastening him in a sort of vice and suspending him on a pole that almost broke his spine.

In the fire torture they lit a very fierce flame; then larded the prisoner's naked feet and held them for nearly an hour towards the flames, till he invented lies that pleased them, or confessed truths that inculpated himself.

In the rope torture they tie the man to a horozontal rope by his hands, which are tied behind his back; they then raise him in the air, and suddenly let him fall with a jolt that dislocates half his joints and makes him utter torturing cries. The only persons present at these butchery scenes are the stolid Inquisitors and the bishop, the grand vicar, or his deputy. There are never more than two lurid torches, which show the executioners, who are clothed in black robes and black hoods that hide all the face, but have holes for eyes, nose and mouth. They strip the prisoner to his waistband; and, if he faint, the doctor of the Inquisition comes in to pronounce how much more suffering the tortured man can bear.

If all this fails, and soul and body are both of steel, the Inquisitors try snares. They put apostates into the bruised man's cell, who comfort him and complain of the Inquisition as one of the greatest scourges with which God ever allowed man to be inflicted. The Inquisitors, too, profess to be touched with their sufferings, to wish their conversion rather than their hurt, and pray them to make even the slightest confession, which is to be kept an inviolable secret, and will restore them to instant liberty.

One Saturday, when, after my meagre prison dinner, I gave my linen, as usual, to the jailors to send to the wash, they would not take it, and a great, cold breath whispered at my heart—to-morrow is the Auto-da-Fè. Immediately after the vespers at the cathedral they rang for matins—which they never do but on the rejoicing eve of a great feast—and I knew that my horrid suspicions were right. Was I glad at my escape from this living tomb, or was I paralysed by fear, at the pile, perhaps, already hewn and stacked for my wretched body? I know not. I was torn in pieces by the devils that rack the brains of unhappy men. I refused my next meal; but, contrary to their wont, they pressed it more than usual. Was it to give me strength to bear my torture? Do God's eyes not reach to the prisons of the Inquisition?

I was just falling into a sickly, fitful sleep, worn out with conjecturing; when about 11 o'clock the great bolts of my cell ground and jolted back, and a party of jailors in black—in a flood of light, so that they looked like demons on the borders of heaven—came in. The alcaid threw down by my pallet a heap of clothes, told me to put them on, and hold myself ready for a second summons. I had no tongue to answer, as they lighted my lamp, left me, and locked the door behind them. Such a trembling seized me for half an hour that I could not rise and look at the clothes, which seemed to me shrouds and winding-sheets. I rose at last, threw myself down before the black cross I had smeared with charcoal on the wall, and committed myself, as a miserable sinner, into God's hands. I then put on the dress; which consisted of a tunic with long, loose sleeves and hose drawers; all black serge, striped with white.

At two o'clock in the morning the wretches came and led me into a long gallery where nearly 200 men—draughted from their various cells, all dressed in black—stood in a long silent line against the wall of the long plain, cold vaulted corridor; where, over every two dozen heads, swung a huge brass lamp. We stood silent as a funeral-train. The women, also in black, were in a neighboring gallery far out of our sight. By sad glimpses down a neighboring dormitory I could see more men dressed in black; who, from time to time, paced backward and forward. These, I afterwards found, were men doomed also to be burnt, not for murder—no, but for having a creed unlike that of the Jesuits. Whether I was to be burnt or not I did not know; but I took courage, because my dress was like that of the rest, and the monsters could not dare to put 200 men at once into one fire; though they did hate all who love not doll-idols and lying miracles.

Presently, as we waited sad and silent, jailors came round and handed us each a long yellow taper and a yellow scapular or tabard, crossed behind and before with red crosses of St. Andrew. These were the Sanbenitos that Jews, Turks, sorcerers, witches, Heathen or perverts from the Roman Catholic Church are compelled to wear. Next came the gradation of our ranks. Those who had relapsed, or who were obstinate, during their accusations, wore the Sambarra; which is gray, with a man's head burning on red faggots painted at the bottom, and all round, reversed flames, and winged and armed black devils horrible to behold. I and 70 others, wore these; and I lost all hope. My blood turned to ice. I could scarcely keep myself from swooning. After this distribution, they brought us, with hard, mechanical regularity, pasteboard conical mitres (carrochas) painted with flames and devils, with the words, SORCERER and HERETIC written round the rim. Our feet were all bare; the condemned men, pale as death, now began to weep, and keep their faces covered with their hands; round which the beads were twisted. God only—by speaking from heaven—could save them. A rough, hard voice now told us we might sit on the ground till our orders came. The old men and boys smiled as they eagerly sat down; for this small relief came to them with the refreshment of a pleasure.

At 4 o'clock they brought us bread and figs, which some dropped by their sides and others languidly ate. I refused mine, but a guard prayed me to put it in my pocket, for I may yet have had need of it. It was as if an angel had comforted me. At 5 o'clock, at daybreak, it was a ghastly sight to see shame, fear, grief, despair written on our pale, livid faces. Yet not one but felt an undercurrent of joy at the prospect of any release, even by death.

Suddenly, as we look at each other with ghastly eyes, the great bell of the Giralda began to boom, with a funeral knell, long and slow. It was the signal of the Gala day of the Holy Office. It was the signal for the people to come to the show. We were filed out one by one. As I passed the gallery in the great hall I saw the Inquisitor, solemn and stern, in his black robes, throned at the gate. Beneath him was his secretary, with a list of the citizens of Seville in his wiry twitching hands. The room was full of the anxious, frightened burghers; who, as their names were called, and a prisoner passed through, moved to his trembling side to serve as his Godfather in the Act of Faith. The honest men shuddered as they took their place in the horrible death procession; the time-serving men smiled at the Inquisitor, and bustled forward. This was thought an honorable office, and was sought after by hypocrites, and suspected men afraid of the Church's sword.

The procession commenced with the Dominicans, whose founder instituted the Inquisition. Before them flaunted the banner of the order, representing in glistening embroidery that burns in the sun and shines like a mirror, the frocked Saint, holding a threatening sword in one hand, and, in the other, an olive-branch, with the motto Justice and Mercy.

God of love, what a mockery of thy attributes! Behind the banner came the prisoners, in their yellow scapulars, holding their lighted torches; their feet bleeding with the stones, and their less frightened godfathers, gay in cloak, in sword, in ruff, tripping along by their side, holding their plumed hats in their hands. The street and windows were crowded with careless eyes. Children were held up to execrate us as we passed to our torturing death. The auto-da-fe was always a holiday sight to the craftsmen and apprentices; it drew more than even a bullfight; because of the touch of tragedy about it. Our procession, like a long black snake, wound on, with its banners and crosses; its shaven monks and mitred bare-footed prisoners; through street after street, heralded by soldiers who ran before to clear a way for us, to stop mules, displace fruitstalls and street performers and their laughing audiences. We at last reached the Church of All the Saints; where, tired, dusty, bleeding, all faint, we were to hear mass.

The church had a grave-vault aspect and was dreadful as a charnel-house. The great altar was veiled in black, and was lit with six silver candles, whose flames shone like yellow stars, with clear twinkle, and a soft halo round each black, fire-tipped wick. On each side of the altar—that seemed to bar out God and his mercy from us, and to wrap the very sun in a grave cloak—were two thrones, one for the Grand Inquisitor and his counsel, another for the King and his court. The one was filled with sexton-like lawyers; the other with jewelled and feathered men.

In front of the great altar, and near the door—where the blessed daylight shines with hope and joy; but not for us—is another altar on which six gilded and illuminated missals laid open; those books of the Gospels, too, in which I had once read such texts as—God is love; Forgive as ye would be forgiven; Faith, hope, charity; these three, but the greatest of these is charity; Near this lesser altar the executive monks had raised a balustraded gallery with bare benches; on which sat the criminals in their yellow and flame-striped tabards, with their godfathers. The doomed ones came last; the more innocent first. Those who entered the black-hung church first, passing up nearest to the altar, sat there, either praying, or in a frightened trance of horrid expectancy. The trembling living corpses wearing the yellow and red mitres came last, preceded by a gigantic crucifix, the face turned from them.

Immediately following these poor mitred men came servitors of the Inquisition, carrying four human effigies fastened to long staves, and four chests containing the bones of those men who had died in the claws of the Inquisition before the fire could be got ready. The coffers were painted with flames and demons, and the effigies wore the dreadful mitre and the crimson and yellow shirt, all a-flame with typical paint. The effigies sometimes represented men tried for heresy since their death, and whose estates had since been confiscated and their effigies doomed to be burned, as a warning for no one within their reach to differ in opinion with the Inquisition.

Every prisoner being now in his place—godfathers, torchmen, pikemen, musketeers, inquisitors and flaunting court—the Provincial of the Augustins mounted the pulpit, followed by his ministrant, and preached a stormy, denouncing, exulting sermon, half an hour long (it seemed a month of anguish), in which his "burning eloquence" compared the Church to Noah's ark; but with this difference, that those animals who entered it before the deluge came out of it unaltered, while the blessed Inquisition had, by God's blessing, the power of changing those its walls once had shut on, turning out—meek as the lambs he saw around him; so tranquil and devout—those who had once been cruel as wolves, and savage and daring as lions.

This cruel, mocking sermon over, two readers mounted the pulpit to shout the list of the names of the condemned, their crimes (now for the first time known to them) and their sentences. We grew all ears, and trembled as each name was read.

As each name was called the alcaid led out the owner of it from his pen to the middle of the gallery opposite the pulpit, where he remained standing, taper in hand; after the sentence, he was led to the altar, where he had to put his hand on one of the missals, and to remain there on his knees.

At the end of each sentence, the reader stopped to pronounce, in a loud angry voice, a full confession of faith, which he exhorted us (the guilty) to join in with heart and voice. Then we all returned to our places. My offence I found, was having spoken bitterly of the Inquisition, and called a crucifix a mere bit of cut ivory. I was therefore declared excommunicated, my goods confiscated to the king, and I was banished Spain, and condemned to the Havannah galleys for five years, with the following penances: I must renounce all friendship with heretics and suspected persons; I must, for three years, confess and communicate three times a month; I must recite five times a day, for three years, the Pater and Ave Maria in honor of the Five Wounds; I must hear mass and sermon every Sunday and feast-day; and, above all, I must guard carefully the secret of all I had said, heard or seen in the holy office (which oath, as the reader will observe, I have carefully kept).

The sentence once read and the worst known, even the condemned seemed happier; and every one fell to eating the figs and bread he had no appetite for in the morning; for we were all worn out with our long fast.

The Inquisitor then quitted his seat, resumed his robes, and followed by twenty priests each with a staff in his hand, he passed into the middle of the church; and, with divers prayers, some of us were relieved from excommunication, each of us receiving a buffet from a priest. Once, such an insult would have sent the blood in a rush to my head, and I had died but I had given a return blow; now, so weak and broken-spirited was I, I broke into tears.

All this time the fussy, frightened citizen who served as my godfather had not dared even to give me a pinch of snuff or to answer any of my anxious questions; now my sentence was commuted, he bowed, chatted and handed me his snuff-box, which I refused with contempt and indignation. But he only shrugged his shoulders and stammered an apology.

Now, one by one, the condemned, faint and staggering, were brought in to hear their sentence, which they did with a frightened vacancy inconceivably touching. A devil would have shed tears to see them; but the Inquisitors were gossiping among themselves and scarcely looked at them; so surfeited were these priests with their enemies' blood.

Every sentence ended with the same cold mechanical formula: That the holy office, being unhappily unable to pardon the prisoners, on account of their relapse and impenitence, found itself obliged to punish them with all the rigor of the law, and therefore delivered them with regret to the hands of secular justice, praying it to use clemency and mercy towards the wretched men; saving their souls by the punishment of their bodies, and recommending death, but not the effusion of blood! Hypocrites!

At the word blood, the justice hangman stepped forward and took possession of their bodies; the alcaid first striking each of them on the chest, to show that they were now abandoned to the rope and fire.

A month before this auto-da-fé, the ministers of the Inquisition preceded by their banner, gorgeous and luminous with sacred symbols, had gone in cavalcade from the Palace of the Holy Office to the Cathedral Square and proclaimed the ceremony with drums, trumpets and clashing of brass, to the great crowd that thronged to hear the good news.

Our present auto-da-fé was to celebrate the king's marriage, and was to be followed by great bull fights. They had erected in the square a great theatre, fifty feet long, raised to a level with the king's balcony. All round ran an amphitheatre of thirty steps for the Council of the Inquisition and the king's ministers. Above these, and higher than the king's seat, was the Grand Inquisitor's place, under a gilt and crimson dais. On the left of the theatre was a second amphitheatre, where the criminals sat and trembled. The fire shone on their pale faces. In the midst was a smaller scaffold, with two cages, for more penned-up criminals, to hear their sentences in. There were in front of this three special chairs, for the preachers and readers of the sentences; and near these chairs was a temporary altar, hung with black.

The king had the queen on his left hand, and the queen's mother on his right. The court ladies filled the rest of the balcony; which, with their flowers and dresses, seemed as if heaped with nosegays. There were also separate seats for the ambassadors, the city judges and the people.

The procession consisted of, first, 100 charcoal men, armed with pike and musket, and laden with billets of wood; then the Dominicans carrying a white cross; then the Duke of Medina Cœli, bearing, as is the hereditary privilege of his family, the great red damask banner of the Inquisition, which has on one side the arms of Spain, and on the other a naked sword thrust through a laurel crown. Next came a green cross muffled in black, followed by nobles and Familiars of the Inquisition dressed in robes, adorned with white and black crosses, edged with gold. The train was closed by 50 halberdiers, or Guards of the Inquisition, clad in white and black, and commanded by the hereditary Protector of the Inquisition in the Archbishopric of Seville.

The standard and cross were fixed above the royal seat, and the Dominicans, who had been all night singing hymns and thirsting for our blood, drew up in line, as the king and ladies at that moment appeared in the balconies, in a blaze of color and splendor, like a sunburst.

This was at 8 o'clock. The charcoal-burners were placed on the left of the king's box, the guard on the right. The great pasteboard effigies were placed prominently at one end of the amphitheatre. Next filed in, sad and slow, the hundred men condemned to the fire; cords round their necks, the three-feet-high flame-colored mitres on their heads; their feet bare; the torches shaking in their trembling hands.

Next, each led between two familiars, came the commuted; and, last of all, the innocent. Some of the condemned had gags in their mouths, to prevent any outburst of blasphemy, and they were each of them surrounded by four or five friars, holding crucifixes to their eyes, and exhorting them, angrily and noisily to repent.

Having passed under the king's balcony, and then round the amphitheatre, they were placed on the left hand of the amphitheatre, between the familiars and the priests; who exhorted them continually to repent.

Next arrived the banner of the parish of Saint Sebastian, the Inquisition Council, the Inquisitors, the Qualifiers, and a long procession secular and religious dignitaries, who placed themselves on the right side of the theatre, surrounding the Grand Inquisitor's chair. Last of all came the Grand Inquisitor, robed in violet, attended by the President of the Council of Castile; and when he (the archdevil) took his seat, the President bowed and retired.

Then mass was again said, and the priest, leaving the altar, sat down; upon which, the Inquisitor, putting on pontifical robes and mitre, bowed first to the altar, and then to the king; and, ascending the steps of the throne, a servitor bearing the cross, read aloud the oath by which the King of Spain had bound himself to protect at all hazards, even to the loss of his kingdom, the Catholic Faith, to extirpate heresy, and to support the Inquisition. Then the king taking off his hat (the great sword held unsheathed by a chamberlain at his left side), swore to observe the oath.

The Inquisitor unrobed and resumed his place, while the same oath was administered to all present. Next, there was a sermon by a Dominican, praising the Inquisition, and denouncing heresy, and the procession moved towards the piles, now dry, piled and stacked with wood billets and fagots.

A few horrid moments of rivetting collars, blankets; a twist or two of the garotte for the least guilty; a struggle here and there, with a demoniac yell, soon stifled by cruel hands and driving blows. The fires were lit. Now the excitement in the boxes got greater and greater. The fans agitated in black waves; the silk dresses too, waved like flowery meadows in the March winds. But no pity; not a tear. The flames raged with cruel leaps and mounts: it drove up in great quivering pyramids, that the wind now and then drifted out in horizontal banners, showing black bodies, black burning stakes, and thin hands clasped together in prayer. Higher and higher mounted the great twisted columns of smoke; now turning to roaring and racing masses of living fire, furiously, wrathfully, and gluttonously hungering for victims.

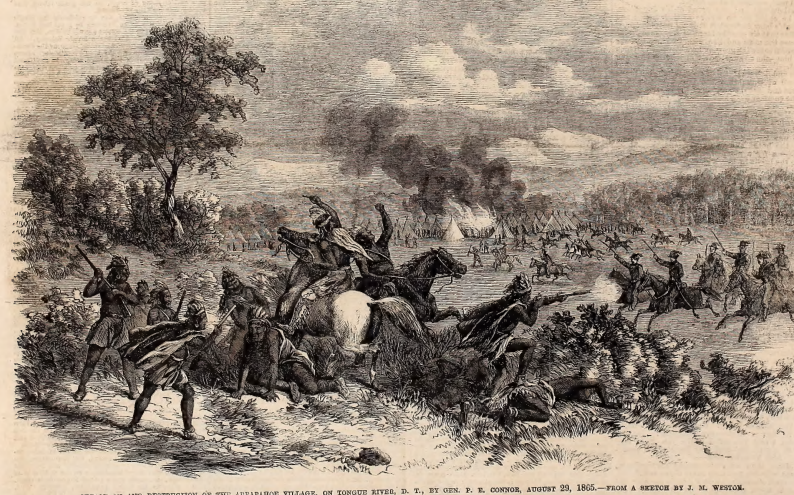
"WELL, farmer, you told us your place was a good place for hunting; now we have tramped it for three hours, and found no game."

"Just so. I calculate, as a general thing, the less game there is the more hunting you have."

THE SCHOLARS OF BRIENNE.

THE winter of 1783 was a severe one in the northern provinces of France. Snowstorms of unusual violence and duration visited every district. The vineyards were half-buried, the great road to Paris was impassable for weeks, and in the lower streets of Brienne the inhabitants were obliged to open narrow passages through the snow, which rose above their ground-door windows.

The situation of that ancient town still renders it liable to such wintry visitations. Surrounded by an open, level country, and built on a steep hillside, its streets rise one above another like successive terraces, up to the grim château which has stood many a siege, and seen various occupants since it was erected by the first seigneur of Brienne. Few travellers visited the city, for it has little traffic, and less fashion, about it. There are traces of wars both early and late—ruined fortifications, tracks of shot, and shell, and fire. There are also an old church or two, and some houses that might interest the antiquary; but, excepting these and their traditions, a more commonplace old burgh is not to be found in northern France.



At the time of our story, Brienne had not such a modern look. Its narrow, irregular streets, turreted roofs and projecting gables, told of builders who flourished with the line of Valois. A noble governor held half-feudal, half-military state in its château, where he commanded a small and very idle garrison. Its trade was old and homely; its burghers careful and quiet; and the great glory of the town was its military college. The citizens believed that half their country's great commanders had been educated there. They had tales of Condé and Turenne, Villiers and De Luxemburg, which, though scarcely historical, were in high credit. The students, of their college, and were now at noon assembled, great and small, in a large, neglected garden, which served them as ground for play and exercise. From the early age at which they were drafted off to the army, the senior students were yet boys, and the juniors mere children; but the controversy of their times had found entrance among them. Some were cadets of noble but reduced families, and stood high on the real or imaginary privileges of their birth, taking a boyish pride in the feudal rights and usages of which France was becoming every day more impatient. They knew that the college had been expressly founded for youths of family; but time, the innovator, had brought parvenus within its walls. Ambitious burghers sent their sons; courtiers, their dependents; and promising boys from the colonies, who could boast no quarterings, found their way thither with the help of friends and patrons. All these naturally took the democratic side, and lost no opportunity of making the fact known, but quarrelled and shouted for the people's rights and liberties with as much zeal and as little knowledge as the fiercest of their opponents. In short, like every society then in France, the students of Brienne were divided into two parties of almost equal strength. The professors, though old and prudent men, were known to entertain similar differences of opinion, and demonstrations which did not transgress the bounds of discipline were rather encouraged.

On the present occasion, the least skilful observer of school affairs would have guessed that something extraordinary was to come off in the garden. Its principal walk had been cleared, together with a gravelled space generally used for a tennis-ground. The snow had been shovelled into great heaps on either side, and the whole body of students separated with military precision, th too, were more popular than students in quiet country towns are apt to be, chiefly on account of the rigid discipline prevailing in military schools of those days, which permitted no visits, except to relations, and little going beyond the college, even on holidays. Besides Christmas and Easter, the principal of those was the governor's birthday; and as the commandant of the château happened to have been born on the 29th of January, his festival came immediately after the storm that year.

It was a cold, clear day, with the snow lying white over town and country. The students had been up early, assisting the porter and other humble office-bearers to clear the entrance and court aristocrats forming an juvenile army, and the democrats another, in order to celebrate the holiday by a grand display of battles in honor of what the boys called their principles.

For this purpose, all fell to work with the enthusiasm and activity of youth. Never had play been more earnest. The aristocrats labored on one side, the democrats on the other; and within an hour, thanks to their united exertions and the plastic nature of the material, a miniature fortress, with bastion, battlement and outworks, on one of Vauban's most approved plans, was constructed out of snow. The young students sent up a cheer of triumph through the cold, clear air, as the perishable fortifications were com pleted; and after settling the articles of war, and appointing officers with extreme formality, the aristocrats were left in possession of the fortress, which it was their duty to defend, while the democrats besieged it with all their force and skill. Neither party had ever seen war. As yet they knew it only by romance and theory; and the mingling of these in their gamic siege would have amused any veteran who had ever mounted a breach or kept a bastion. The governor of the snow-built fortress—a fair-faced, noble-looking youth of 16, who had been elected to that high office by acclamation, as an acknowledged and most popular leader—addressed his troops in a speech full of classical quotations; reminded them of the exploits performed by Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and their own illustrious ancestors; and closed with an exhortation to maintain the honor of the noble houses from which the were descended, by driving that contemptible rabble from beneath their walls.

The besieging general, a fiery-eyed Parisian, in no less esteem with his party, talked of the rights of man, prophesied the triumph of liberty, and shouted "death to the tyrants."

No imitation of the pomp and circumstance of war was wanting; no manœuvre of all they had been taught in that methodical college was left unpractised. There were trumpets and drums, war-cries and standards. Cannon were planted on every available height, in the form of boys, to fling snowballs; sappers, armed with spades and and shovels, advanced under cover of their fire to mine the walls. There were storming parties and forlorn hopes, led by most experienced officers, and attempts at surprise and escalade; but all to no purpose. The besieged had a strong position, and kept it gallantly, showering missiles of snow, hardened by sunny rapid but ingenious processes, making all sorts of sallies, and occasionally carrying off the youngest of their enemies as prisoners of war.

In the meantime, tempers waxed warm on both sides. No contest, however small its object, can be long carried on, without unsealing some bitter waters. The blows grew harder, the snore more spiteful. There was earnestness and almost ferocity in the fighting now, which did not escape the notice of the only spectators within sight—two men of gray hair and military appearance, who stood, each wrapped in a rough gray cloak, and smoking a long pipe at the garden-gate.

The tallest and most martial-looking of the pair was old Jules, the chief porter and general overseer of domestic matters in the college. He had never worn uniform, nor served out of Brienne; but in discourse, deportment, and inclinations, there was not a more soldier-like man within his country. The other was Jean Martin, his cousin-german, who had been a peasant's son in the neighborhood till he went with a volunteer corps of the Marquis Lafayette, to serve in the American war of independence. The peace signed in Paris in the previous year had closed their campaigns; and though the newly-established republic rewarded her French auxiliaries with liberal grants from the inexhaustible treasury of prairie and forest lands, such was the applause known to await them at home, that the greater part of Lafayette's soldiers chose to return with their commander. Fighting for liberty was then an untried but most popular business in France. Jean Martin came home covered with glory in the the eyes of his kindred and old neighbors. All that winter his father's cottage was a place of evening gatherings, to hear him relate his battles and marches. The old peasant felt his house raised half-way to nobility by such a son, and the porter of the military college considered Jean the only one of his relations worthy to visit him in Brienne. He had accordingly sojourned for some time with old Jules, and seen the wonders of the college. There was a museum of arms and military engines, on which the porter delighted to expatiate. Jean Martin was a praiseworthy listener, when not engaged on his American campaigns; and the cousins now stood in a high state of mutual satisfaction, smoking their pipes, and gazing on the siege of that snow-built fortress with an interest scarcely inferior to that of the contending students.

"That is a brave boy who leads the attack," said Jean; "so is he who holds the fortress."

"Yes," replied the porter, who prided himself on knowing every student's genealogy, and had extremely aristocratic prejudices. "Would you believe that the young rogue who leads the democrats actually belongs to one of the best houses in Paris? Their name is Caulincourt. They can count back five hundred years without one low alliance; but the house is terribly reduced. There is a wine-shop kept in their hotel in the Rue du Temple, and that boy has taken to the new notions. These are queer times! The boy who holds the fort so well, and looks so like a nobleman's son, is poorly enough descended, though his father was an officer in Montcalm's army, and fell at Quebec; his great-grandfather, as I know, was that cousin of Madame de Maintenon whom she could neither bribe nor frighten out of Protestantism. He fled to Switzerland at the revocation, but came back when Louis le Grande was gone, and they say"—here the porter's voice fell—"he lived and died a mere pastor at Maziers."

"His great-grandson knows something of defence," said Jean: "I have not seen either since we kept Fort Philip on the Mississippi; but tell me, cousin, who is yonder boy, who stands alone leaning against the old apple-tree, and smiles so scornfully every time young Caulincourt and his company are repulsed."

Old Jules followed, with a glance of any thing but approbation, the direction of the soldier's eye, which rested on a dark, spare youth of Italian features, grave, keen, and very discontented-looking, who had been one of the most earnest and active in the sieges, in a fit of sudden disgust, he retired to the old apple-tree, and stood there surveying the proceedings of his comrades with silent but manifest contempt.

"He," said the porter, "is of no family at all—one of the patronised, you understand. He was born in Corsica, and don't know who sent him here; but the best descended boy at the college is not as ambitious as that boy. When he is not in command he is always in a quarrel with somebody, or standing alone as you see him now. The professor don't seem to think him clever, and the young noblemen try to keep him in his place, but it is wonderful how often he gets the upper hand. Just look at Caulincourt coaxing him back. That boy condescends so to his inferiors!"

The general of the besieging army was indeed making most inviting signals to the recusant of the apple-tree; but he answered loud enough for Jules and Jean to hear:

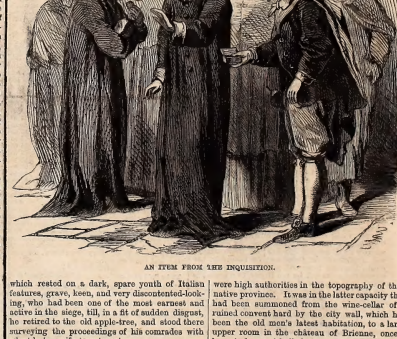
"No, you'll never take the place; you don't know the way. As I said before, give me the command, and I'll plant the colors on it in half an hour."

Caulincourt looked angry, but his soldiers began to talk. There was an evident inclination to try the new general. So he descended to the ranks in quiet indignation, and the young Italian literally jumped from the apple-tree to the post of power.

The besieged set up a shout of derision, but their scorn did not last. The new leader whispered his commands, altered the position of his army, and drew them into a sally, in which one division cut off the retreat, while another attacked the fortress, at a point hitherto untried, and in less than a quarter of an hour the Italian planted his colors, consisting of three old silk handkerchiefs tacked together, on the highest of its snowy battlements.

"He is a young general!" cried Jean Martin clapping his hands in a glow of enthusiasm "Cousin, I have seen nothing like that since the day when we, with some help from the Americans, surrounded Burgoyne's army, at the springs of Saratoga."

"He a general!" cried Jules, in great wrath "I wonder to hear you, who have served under a marquis. The fellow has done nothing in due form; I could have shown him better myself. But there's the dinner-bell, and our soup will be cold."



The bell which smote old Jules with that well-founded fear summoned the students from their mimic warfare. The fortress was, however, dismantled by the special commandant of the victorious general. He left his flag floating over its ruins, and laughed at the defeated governor, who was sorely discomfited, not so much for having lost his fort, as because in the fray he had hurt a sickly boy, though the brave child wiped up his eyes, and promised to say nothing about it. So the garrison left to snow and silence, and the twilight came down upon Brienne.

Many evenings and mornings come and go in the course of thirty years, and many things besides had come and gone in France, when, on the 29th of January, 1814, old Jules and his cousin again stood together at the fall of the winter day. Both were now old indeed. Jules was approaching ninety, Jean Martin had numbered four score and five. The world of their youth was long dead and buried under successive ruins. They had outlived seven forms of government, and seen changes of power, and glory, and faith; but except that the gray hair had grown snow white, and even the military erectness of Jules had bowed to time, there was little change in the cousins.

They had led hardy and temperate lives, and in consequence enjoyed that singular preservation of faculties which keeps the oldest age green. Both remembered the times of Louis XV., and were high authorities in the topography of their native province. It was in the latter capacity they had been summoned from the wine-cellar of a ruined convent hard by the city wall, which had been the old men's latest habitation, to a large upper room in the château of Brienne, once a baron's banquet-hall, but now bare and dusty, with queer stains on the walls and floor, a great wood fire blazing on the hearth, a stray chair or two, and a table covered with papers, between which and the nearest window a man in a general's uniform, much the worse for wear, was walking backwards and forwards like one made restless by anxiety.

The old cousins knew that he was the emperor —people said the world—but that was years ago, before the grand army marched for Russia. Now there was an allied army in the heart of France, pressing from all sides towards her capital, and fighting for every town and village on their way. That day the Russians had been driven out of Brienne after a desperate battle, but the bombshells from the French batteries had set fire to the old town; and when the place was won, half its streets, dwellings and churches, the town hall and the military college were so many heaps of black and smouldering ruins.

Among them the troops remained under arms, though now the deep on the surrounding country, and the previous day had been spent in a fatiguing march through the marshy forest of Jerre; but through the deepening gray of night there rose from hill and dale the glare of hostile watchfires. Blucher, with his mingled host of Germans, Russians and Cossacks, was there, for the day of decisive victories had passed from the French eagles. The imperial army was now but the broken remnants of many battles. The genius of its chief had been discovered not to be invincible, by all except himself. Yet even he could not rest for the dread of gathering enemies, and the two aged men had been summoned to his quarters in the château, to give some information concerning local byways, which maps did not supply, for a retreat had been determined on before the break of day.

All that the cousins could recollect of that interview was that the great commander's questions came quick and many. They had neither words nor memory to reply, for grief and consternation was upon them. Jean Martin had seen war before; both remembered the revolution, had lived through the reign of terror, and beheld the northern enemy in their own Brienne; but to see the old mansion burned down, and the noble cottage laid in ashes, was more than their white heads could bear without confusion.

"Caulincourt!" cried the impatient man of power, as a care-worn marshal entered, conducting a man whose dress belonged to civil life, and whose looks were more thoughtful than settled, as apt to wear. "Caulincourt! these old men have lost their wits, if they ever had any. Why do they leave people to ask them all things, or to have brought? Oh, I see, the protestant curé, whom we found in the forest. Well, monsieur le curé would have imperceptibly softened, you made a capital guide, though not very willing to bear a company at first. Perhaps you never saw fighting before, and didn't care for being so near the cannon?"

"Sir, no!" said the curé, with a respectful bend, "that was not the reason; but I had been on my way to see a sick member of my scattered flock—"

"Well, well, you will get back to your parish in good time and see them all," said the emperor; "but they say you know something of this country. Tell me all about it."

And once more the questions came fast and many. The answers, however, were less satisfactory, for the protestant curé answered not only as clergy, but as much good military blood that the imperial questioner declared he had some sense, and took him confidentially to the window to see Brienne by watchfires. The curé then pointed out a narrow byway, which led beyond the enemy's position into the open country, and ventured to hint that a safe and quiet retreat might be made there. The emperor made no reply, but he took notes and gave orders to weary aides-de-camp who came and went; and at last, looking the curé steadily in the face as he was gazing involuntarily on the burned town, the wasted country around, and the dismal French army, said:

"What is your name, and where did you get so much military knowledge?"

The reason was silent; the great fire was burning red. Old Jules and Jean, kept in the room lest they might be wanted, were leaning, half-asleep, on the wall, in charge of a French attendant. Caulincourt sat in the furthest corner of the room, fast asleep, and dreaming, perhaps, of his embassy to the allied sovereigns, and the notes that were sent to him every day to "sign nothing." The curé had been waiting for his dismissal, and was slightly startled, but he answered:

"My name, sire, is François d'Aubigny, and my military knowledge was acquired yonder," and he pointed to the still smouldering seminary.

"Ha!" said the emperor, whose memory was singularly strong at times, "you are then my old schoolfellow, Thoughi I knew your face. It is long ago. What is all the world and my future past? You showed as much science in defending a small fortress as that old garden, now they as would have insured you a marshal's staff."

"Perhaps I did," said the curé: "but war is a fearful trade. A chance blow I gave a little schoolfellow that day first made me think so; and oh, sire, look at that burned town, this bloody garden, and the dead that lie about us, and, if you can, give up peace."

The silence of the night, the scene, the circumstances, and the truth that had been spoken strangely equalized the schoolfellows once more, in spite of history and fortune. They stood together as two accountable men, with no other distinction between them. For a moment the dark, resolute face was lighted up with a long gaze on the college of his youth, burnt down by his own bombshells. Next, it kindled up with self confidence and imperial pride.

"You will restore peace to France," he said, "by driving these invaders from her soil. To-morrow I will destroy Blucher; on Wednesday I will annihilate his forces; on Saturday the entire Austrian force will join me; and within a month the allies will be too happy to evacuate the Rhine, with the loss of cannon and baggage. As for this town, I would and make it a provincial capital. I will erect a palace, a college, and perhaps, a church on the ground of you old garden. Then you will see what this town will become. But, good-night. Victor will send you safe to your friends, and I will not forget your services."

So the curé was dismissed, and the French army retreated before daybreak. But Blucher was not annihilated, neither were the Russians destroyed. The palace, the college, and the church were never built, and most people know how peace was restored to France and Europe. But old Jules, even to his ninety-fifth, and Jean Martin to his eighty-eighth year, lived, they said, contented on the old quarters, and continued to tell all listeners a broken story, better known to some of the ancient citizens concerning one old curé and emperor's fellow-students, who forgot the art of war, to be the humble, labourious curé of a small parish, through which he once guided the march of his famous schoolfellow, witnessed a war that almost his last victory, and talked with him over the burnt ruins of Brienne.

A FAITHFUL TERRIER AND THE DOG TAX.

THE Edinburgh correspondent of the Ayrshire Express sends that journal the following story of canine fidelity:

"I may give you an instance of taxation which I think is hardly more oppressive than any other which burden we have in the city. It is a dog tax case. Not that I object to the tax, because I am aware that it is not in existence we should be perfectly overrun with the nasty curs; I only cite it in this particular instance. Nearly six years ago a terrier dog was found lying under a horizontal gravestone in Old Greyfriars' churchyard, Edinburgh—the burial ground in connection with the church presided over by Dr. Robert Lee. The poor brute had evidently been there some days, and although exhausted with hunger and thirst, vicously refused to be removed. It was coaxed with milk and other comestibles, and through the kindness and attention of the gravediggers was soon in a position to run about; but it resolutely refused to leave the churchyard. There had been a number of funerals from the vicinity for some days before, but to which the dog was observed to have followed that the cur's master had been among the number laid under the sod; but whither it came no one could tell. From that day to this "Bob," for such the name he gets, has remained in Greyfriars' Kirkyard. He sleeps in it every night, and spends most of his time in it during the day.

"During the inclement winter the year before last, Serjeant Scott, of the Royal Engineers, one of Bob's best friends, got the animal taken into his house for a night or two; but the dog was evidently unhappy, and soon returned to his quiet quarters under the gravestone. Bob got to know the sergeant's dinner hour to a minute. He will make point at the corner of Candlemaker Row and George-St. Bridge at a certain hour each day, go home with him, and share his dinner. Some time ago Serjeant Scott prepared to return to the office, Bob would give him a "friendly call" at a distance from Greyfriars, give a farewell wag or two with his tail, and trot back to the graveyard. Bob is well known, I believe, among his acquaintances, and one of them is on the frequent occasion of his visit to the dog tax.

"Mr. Trail, a highly respectable refreshment-room keeper in the vicinity of the Register House, got up Bob, and for his kindness he has received institution fees and dog tax ever since—more than once, I believe, the faithful terrier occasionally visiting the refreshment-room to supply the wants of his friend. He is rarely too bad. As well seems the publican in the vicinity, who occasionally has a few drinks, or the baker, who now and again gives him a bun or a biscuit; or any one of the poor people who frequent the now longer he lives—and Bob is getting old—he gathers the more friends around him."
